Mr. MORRILL. My only object in making the inquiry is to see whether the amendment of the Senator from Ohio can be so shaped as that, in my judgment, it will obviate the necessity of a recommitment, and therefore, with a view of an understanding with him on that subject, I will say that I propose for his acceptance to strike out, in the twenty-eighth line of his proposed amendment, the words "and kind," after the word "manner," and to insert instead the words "in conformity to the laws of nations;" so that it will read:

And that the executive and military authorities of the United States are hereby directed to retaliate upon the prisoners of the enemy in such manner, in conformity to the laws of nations, as shall be effective in deterring him from the perpetration in future of cruel and barbarous treatment of our soldiers.

Mr. WADE. If I understand the amendment, it does not vary the sense and efficacy of the original proposition, and I do not see that I have any objection to accepting that as a modification of my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. MORRILL. Then, Mr. President, as I understand the case, I do not see any occasion for a recommitment; and I say this from an attentive observation of what has passed in the Senate, both upon the amendments which are submitted and upon the general course of the argument. I do not propose at the present moment to make any further argument than will be necessary to justify this statement. I think the Senate now are all agreed, with perhaps a single exception, upon all that is substantial in the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio and the other proposed amendments. I shall attempt to verify and justify this statement by a reference to each of the resolutions that have been submitted to the Senate.

The resolution now before us starts out with the assumption that the rebels have treated our prisoners with gross cruelty; that they have committed excesses that are not agreeable to the principles of civilized warfare; secondly, that in the judgment of Congress it has become justifiable and necessary to adopt measures of retaliation; and thirdly, and lastly, that the executive and military authorities shall adopt measures of retaliation in such manner, conformable to the principles of public law, as shall be effective in correcting these abuses and excesses of the confederate authorities. Those are the three propositions contained in the resolution as it now stands as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Ohio. I will repeat them: first, that the rebel authorities have been guilty of gross outrages; second, that it is the judgment of Congress that measures of retaliation ought to be adopted; and, third, that the President of the United States shall adopt such measures, consistent with the principles of public law, as shall be effectual in restraining these excesses.

From my observation of the course of the argument, every Senator on this floor who has spoken on the subject, with a single exception, has affirmed and reaffirmed each of these three distinct propositions. Let me take the amendments that have been offered. I have in my hands, first, though I believe it was not first in order, that of the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON.] He affirms that the rebels have been guilty of these outrages. He does not doubt it. I now take that of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] He does not doubt it. I now take that of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK,] which affirms the same thing; and last, but by no means least, because the honorable Senator gives a significance to it by what follows, that of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] I will read his language:

That the treatment of our officers and soldiers in rebel prisons is cruel, savage, and heart-rending beyond all precedent; that it is shocking to morals; that it is an offense against human nature itself; that it adds new guilt to the great crime of rebellion, and constitutes an example from which history will turn with sorrow and disgust.

I need say no more, then, as to the first proposition, than, in the language of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] to congratulate the Senate that they are agreed upon one thing. We are all agreed without exception upon that. The honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who, to some extent, in his argument, combats the idea of general barbarity, concedes that, as a general statement, the treatment of our prisoners by the rebels has been cruel and barbarous in the extreme. We are then all agreed on the main question.

Now as to the remedy. Each of these amendments proposes retaliation, with the exception of that to which I shall advert by and by, submitted by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] Each looks to retaliation as a remedy; each proposes it; and what is the limitation? The limitation is in their own phrase, each one proposing some method peculiar to himself; but each and every amendment looks to retaliation as the remedy for the conceded ill. What then is the difference between us? We all agree that the evil exists; we all agree that retaliation is the remedy. What is the limitation of the Senator from Ohio? He says that it is the sense of Congress that the President shall retaliate; that it is his duty to retaliate. How? A great deal has been said about starving, cutting the ears of prisoners, &c.; a great deal has been said about the barbarities which have been inflicted upon our soldiers, and that we are to do the same thing "in kind;" but that phraseology has been stricken from the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, and it now stands that the sense of the American Congress is that the President of the United States shall retaliate for these barbarities to the end that these excesses may come to an end. But how? According to his own whim or caprice, or the whim or caprice of any man or set of men? No; but according to the principles of public law. That is the limitation.

Mr. COLLAMER. "International law" would be better.

Mr. MORRILL. I am willing to say "international law," or "the laws of nations."

Having established these first two propositions, in which we all agree, for no Senator has spoken on this floor who does not agree to them save and except only my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] the logic of the thing is that we will retaliate according to the principles of civilized war. I am of course under no necessity of arguing the question of the propriety of retaliation, because on that we are all committed. If I am right in this statement, I submit that the whole discussion is concluded by the amendment which the honorable Senator from Ohio has at length adopted. Whatever may be said of the original proposition, by the amendment which he has adopted he has at length brought himself precisely within the judgment of the Senate, within sentiments uttered by every Senator in debate, with a single exception, and in harmony with all resolutions that have been offered as amendments, with the exception of different phraseology; and therefore, unless we intend to back out from the purpose of expressing to the President of the United States the judgment of the American Congress that measures of retaliation ought to be adopted, it strikes me there is no occasion for this recommitment.

I desire to say a word in regard to the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] who dissents, and his proposition is the only dissent from the general proposition contained in the resolution as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Ohio. My only object in referring to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts is to show that it is an absolute unqualified dissent, and is a proposition against any measure of retaliation whatever.

Mr. SUMNER. Read the first section.

Mr. MORRILL. The first section of the Senator's resolution reads as follows:

"Retaliation is harsh always, even in the simplest cases, and is permissible only"—

Mr. SUMNER. Therefore it is permissible. Mr. MORRILL.

"And is permissible only where, in the first place, it may reasonably be expected to effect its object, and where, in the second place, it is consistent with the usages of civilized society; and that, in the absence of these essential conditions, it is a useless barbarism, having no other end than vengeance, which is forbidden alike to nations and to men."

If my honorable friend concedes that retaliation is permissible, then I shall have no occasion to make the argument I was about to submit to the Senate. If it is conceded that the facts of this case bring this statement within the conditions of the resolution of the honorable Senator from Ohio, then I have no argument to make upon that portion of the proposition.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator, I presume, did not hear the remarks which I made in explanation of the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I had the misfortune not to be in the Chamber at the time.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator had been present, he might remember that I expressly cited authorities in regard to the law of retaliation and recognized it as a law, but insisted that it had its limitations, that it was surrounded by barriers from which we cannot escape, and those barriers are those to which I refer in the first resolution, being the usages of civilized society and the reasonable prospect that the retaliation when employed will have a practical result.

Mr. MORRILL. I had not the pleasure of listening to the argument of the honorable Senator, and therefore I was obliged to draw the deductions which I thought could fairly be drawn from the statement of the case presented in his amendment. While it appeared to me that in the first resolution the honorable Senator concedes that under certain circumstances and certain limitations retaliation is the right of a nation at war, in the third resolution he negatives the idea of retaliation in the present case.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator will be good enough to read the introductory words of the third resolution, he will see that it is expressly limited to this: that there can be no imitation of rebel barbarism in the treatment of prisoners. The whole argument is founded on that; it stands on that; that is, that we cannot imitate what is barbarous. There I stand.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I should like to ask the honorable Senator one question, and upon his answer will depend whether I have another word to say or not; as the question now stands on the amendment of the honorable Senator from Ohio, the retaliation proposed is to be in harmony with the principles of international law, and I ask him whether that is allowable?

Mr. SUMNER. I have no doubt that retaliation according to the principles of international law is allowed.

Mr. MORRILL. Then, Mr. President, that is precisely our position now. We have arrived at that point precisely; and there I am content to leave it. I do not combat, then, the proposition of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. I understand that the argument contained in the third section of his amendment was addressed to the statement in the original resolution, that we were to retaliate "in kind;" we were to starve, &c. That having failed, and the resolution now standing that whatever measures are adopted are to be in harmony with the principles of public law, we are all agreed; even the honorable Senator from Massachusetts himself is agreed to what is proposed by the Senate now; first, that barbarities have been exercised by the enemy; second, that retaliation is proper; and, third, that the measure of it shall be that measure which is meted out by the principles of public law. I submit, therefore, that we are agreed upon the whole subject, and that there is no occasion to recommit this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on recommitting the resolution reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, together with the amendments and proposed amendments, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WADE. It is perfectly evident from the argument that the Senator from Maine has made on this subject that the resolution cannot be put in a form less objectionable than it is now, and therefore I shall conclude that those who vote for the recommitment of this resolution are really against the principle of retaliation in any shape whatever. It will result in that, and the country may as well know it now as at any time. If gentlemen recommit this resolution, it is because they do not intend to retaliate. That is all that I wish to say.

Mr. CLARK. I cannot agree to the proposition put by the Senator from Ohio. I am entirely in favor of retaliation, and I am now at present opposed to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to recommit; but if after attempting to amend the resolution we do not come exactly to the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, I am not to be set down as against retaliation. I shall vote against the motion to recommit now, and am willing to vote upon the amendments. If the Senate can bring these amendments into a satisfactory shape to the Senate and we can pass the resolution when so amended, I shall be content; but if by and by we find that we cannot get it in such a shape as we think we ought to have it in, I shall be at liberty to move to commit it without being set down as against retaliation. It is only to exclude such a conclusion that I make these remarks.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think the Senator from Ohio is justified, in the present condition of the business before the Senate, in what he says. What is the business of a committee? It is to prepare the business of the Senate for the consideration of the body, and to bring it before the body in proper shape. It is very evident, not only from the debate, but from the various amendments that have been proposed, that the measure as it came from the committee was not in accordance with the sentiment of any considerable portion of the body. An amendment has been proposed by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] another by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK,] and amendments have been proposed by other Senators. They are all before the body now, in some shape or other, either formally or informally; they ought to be considered; but I submit to Senators we are not in a condition in full body to consider these propositions as they can be considered by the committee. Each proposition can be taken up in the committee, a small body, and its merits understood; and then, after a consideration of all the propositions some measure can be brought before the body that will be unobjectionable.

I am not willing to stop with a mere proposition that there shall be retaliation according to the usages of war. I want to go further, and have a remedy that is adequate, complete, and I think that remedy is by an exchange of prisoners. I think it is proper for this body to express its desire that the Administration shall secure an early exchange of prisoners. It is not enough to leave them in the prisons of the South, even if they are fed in those prisons. The evidence the Senator from Ohio has brought before the body shows that many of the prisoners are sick. I submit to that Senator, is it possible, even if they are treated as well as prisoners can be, that they can be restored to health as certainly and as comfortably there as if they were brought to their homes? Let them be brought to their wives, to their mothers, to their sisters, to be nursed and restored to health. That is what I desire to see; and I think that the committee, when they consider this whole subject, will provide for an expression by the Senate, in proper terms, of its sentiment upon that question as well as upon the other.

I cannot see any objection to the reference. Why does the Senator say that that brings about a defeat of the measure? Does he say that the Committee on Military Affairs is against the measure? Does he say that that committee will not respect what now appears to be the sentiment of the body? He is not authorized in making that assumption. He must assume as a member of the body that one of the committees, highly respectable, will do its duty at an early day, and will bring this measure before the Senate in such a shape as the committee believe will meet the sentiment of the body. It is our duty to so presume that the committee will do its duty, and doing its duty, having heard this full debate, having all these propositions before it, I do believe that that committee can bring before us a proposition that will meet the almost unanimous approval of the body. Believing that, I esteem it to be my duty to send the resolution back to the committee. Very little delay need result. It is a very common practice when the body differs in opinion upon a subject to send it back for the further consideration of the committee, and why not this? Is this an exception from all other matters of legislation before us? Let that committee consider it, and without delay and at an early day bring this measure again before the body in the light of this discussion, and in the light of the numerous amendments that have been proposed, in such a shape as will probably meet with the approval of the entire body.

Mr. HOWARD. I will thank the Chair to state the question that is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on recommending the resolution, together with the amendments and proposed amendments, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall vote against the recommitment of this subject to the Committee on Military Affairs, because, like my friend from Ohio, I shall deem such a result as a defeat of the measure entirely in this body. Rather than incur such a disaster, for I should regard it as a disaster, I should much prefer to vote for the resolution as amended by the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Maine, and I shall vote for that amendment if I get an opportunity.

Mr. COLLAMER. If I understand it aright, I believe the proposition of the Senator from Maine has been accepted by the Senator from Ohio as a part of his amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. But it has not been adopted yet by the body.

Mr. COLLAMER. But it will go with the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, he having inserted it in his amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I say, rather than recommit the measure, I shall vote for that amendment; but I shall do it without much hope, I confess, of good results to flow from this retaliation put in that form. I shall vote for it, hoping that something beneficial to our prisoners and our cause may result from it, although the hope is not very strong; and I will state why, if the Senate will allow me.

The amendment recommends retaliation, and stops there. Now, sir, it is to be applied to a certain state of facts, a state of facts now existing among our own prisoners in the hands of the enemy, or hereafter to exist there. We propose retaliation because we are satisfied that some wrongs are done to our prisoners in the hands of the rebels. We propose to remedy those wrongs, either to punish them, or, for the future, to prevent them. It is one of these two things which we aim at. How are we going to reach this object under this term "retaliation"? It is denied, and possibly the Executive of the United States may join in the denial, that any cruelty whatever can be inflicted upon a prisoner of war. By the laws of war and the laws of nations it is the duty of the captors to treat their prisoners with kindness and humanity, and to support them by reasonable sustenance, not indulging in any luxuries, but simply bounding their labors by the convenience and comfort of the prisoners. That is the extent of the duty of the captors. Now we are told that we cannot inflict similar distresses upon the rebel prisoners in our hands because that would be barbarous; it would be, in the language of my friend from Massachusetts, an imitation of the barbarity of the rebels.

What is there, then, to retaliate? If you cannot retaliate distress for distress, if you cannot inflict hunger for hunger, and, if you please, starvation for starvation, exposure for exposure, shooting for shooting, if that has occurred, pray tell me what ground is there left for retaliation at all? That is the point; and it would be the easiest thing in the world for the Executive of the United States, if he shall adopt the principles of my learned friend from Massachusetts, to say to our prisoners in the hands of the rebels, "The laws of war do not permit me to restrain by retaliation the cruelties which are inflicted upon you; you must submit, therefore, to the hard necessities which you are under, to the cruelties inflicted upon you, because I cannot relieve you; I cannot retaliate, returning like for like; I can do, in short, nothing." Suppose he puts this construction upon your resolution, suppose he adopts the humanitarian and sentimental doctrine of my friend from Massachusetts and Professor Lieber, the result will be that he can do nothing and will do nothing.

Sir, I did propose to go further than this in the original resolution. The country has waited month after month with the utmost anxiety and impatience for the Executive to do, or attempt to do, something to prevent these barbarities and cruelties exercised upon our prisoners. He has done nothing. He has not lifted his hand. He has not raised the voice of remonstrance even (certainly not officially) against these barbarities, and if therefore you do not instruct him specifically as to the kind of principles which we understand to be retaliation, I beg to know what security we have that he will exercise retaliation in any form, or inflict any punishment whatever for the crimes that have been inflicted against our prisoners, or take one single step by way of prevention? He may adopt the doctrine of Plato, for aught we know, and say that punishment is inflicted not because a crime has been committed, but to prevent the commission of crime in the future. Non quia peccatum est, sed ne peccet. But we know not what he will do. We know, however, that if he adopts the principles of Professor Lieber and my friend from Massachusetts, he will do absolutely nothing, and this whole discussion will go for nothing, and your resolution will go for nothing. But still trusting that he will give a more sensible construction to the laws of nations and the laws of war, hoping at least that some good will come of this, I shall vote for the amendment as agreed upon by my friend from Ohio.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator from Michigan before he takes his seat whether in his opinion, as the law now stands, the President is authorized to make retaliation?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not doubt it at all. I never entertained a doubt on that subject. The President of the United States is Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, and as such, in the absence of all restraining legislation of Congress, has authority to execute and carry into force the entire code of war. We can restrain him and regulate him if we see fit; but we have not done so thus far. He therefore has the authority.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. For myself, sir, I have very serious doubts whether that authority is in the President unless Congress pass some law on the subject. In 1799, it seems, the Congress of that day supposed the President was not so authorized, and passed a law authorizing him to make retaliation. It seems also that in 1813 the Congress of the United States supposed that the Executive had no power to make retaliation upon British prisoners of war in our hands, and therefore they enacted a law conferring that authority upon the President.

I confess that before this debate began I was myself of the impression that beyond doubt the power of retaliation existed in the President independent of any legislation; but when I came to look into the Constitution, when I heard read the acts of 1799 and 1813, by which Congress assumed to confer that power upon the President, I had most serious doubts whether he does possess that power now without a law of Congress conferring that power upon him. The Constitution expressly gives to Congress the power to make the regulations necessary to govern the land and naval forces, in these words:

"Congress shall have power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces."

In another provision it says:

"Congress shall have power to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations."

The Constitution thus recognizes the law of nations as the existing law of the land, paramount even to the Constitution itself, and authorizes Congress to punish our citizens for the violation of the laws of nations. By the conferring of the express power upon Congress "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces" it seems to me the power is clearly given to Congress to pass laws to govern the land and naval forces even in the treatment of the prisoners of war who are in the hands of the Army and the Navy.

I confess, sir, that my impression now is different from what it was when this debate commenced. My impression, independent of this discussion and what I have heard here, was that the President, as Commander-in-Chief, was clothed with that authority; but when I came to look into the statute of 1799, and then again into the statute of 1813, and into the Constitution itself, and even the Articles of War, which lie before me, I am rather of the opinion that Congress has a responsibility on this subject in order to confer upon the President the power of retaliation. In these Articles of War which I have in my hand there are certain regulations deciding what shall be done with prisoners of war. I will read some of them:

"Prisoners of war will be disarmed and sent to the rear, and reported as soon as practicable to headquarters," &c.

Then a return is to be made of them.

"The private property of prisoners will be duly respected, and each shall be treated with the respect due to his rank."

Then they go on to provide that they shall obey the necessary orders given and shall receive for subsistence one ration each, without regard to rank; and the wounded are to be treated with the same care as the wounded of the Army.

"Other allowances"—

That is, independent of this one ration, and the treatment of the wounded—

"I will depend on conventions with the enemy."

"Prisoners' horses will be taken for the Army."

"Exchange of prisoners and release of officers on parole depend on the orders of the Commander-in-Chief under the instructions of the Government."

These are a part of the regulations of war which are binding, as I understand, as a law, upon the Army and its officers. Now, in order that the President should have power to treat these prisoners in any other manner than is provided by the rules and regulations of war, I am rather inclined to the opinion, I repeat, that legislation may be necessary. I confess for myself that the language of the act of 1813, or the language of the act of 1799 would be more in accordance with my judgment as to the best form of words to be used in an enactment on this subject. I think we should do by law as our fathers did in 1813: we should confer upon the President the authority, in case of any violation of the rules of civilized warfare upon our prisoners in the hands of the rebels, to make full and ample retaliation upon the prisoners that we hold in our hands.

Mr. President, I believe that retaliation may be effective, and that it is in accordance with the highest principles of humanity. I will state a case that came to my knowledge through Captain Grant, of the State of Wisconsin, who was captured near Petersburg, and as our armies were making advances into different portions of the confederacy was carried from place to place. In the course of his imprisonment I believe he was in eleven different places of confinement. He finally made his escape when they were moving him a short time ago from Charleston to Columbia, in South Carolina, coming up through western North Carolina, hiding, and being protected by the loyal refugees in the mountains there, and has but a few days since arrived here in Washington. He informs me that when confined in Charleston, a part of the time with other prisoners, he was put under the fire of our guns by the rebels. They were under fire for a considerable time. General Foster, in command of our forces, put an equal number of rebel prisoners in his hands under fire, and then our men in Charleston were released from this condition. He says another thing: that when they were first placed in custody there in the city of Charleston they were placed in an open space without cover, exposed to the weather, and had very poor rations, and were furnished with no clothing except what was upon them, and that had become very poor. General Foster did in fact give notice, I think, to General Jones, in command of the rebel forces in South Carolina, that the treatment which he accorded to our prisoners in his hands would be the measure of his (General Foster's) treatment to prisoners in his hands; and as soon as this was known in the city of Charleston, Captain Grant informs me they were at once put into good quarters and were furnished with good clothing. So it had its effect.

As a principle, therefore, within the rules of civilized warfare I am in favor of giving the authority to the President to make the retaliations which may be necessary to effect the purpose. But when it comes down to details in the exercise of the power, I might differ from some gentlemen on this floor. I do not believe I would starve prisoners to death, or scalp them, or torture them. I would prefer to resort to some other mode of retaliation, and to select, perhaps by lot, officers of the enemy, beginning with the highest in our hands, and give the enemy notice that on a given day, unless this cruelty was abandoned, a certain number should be shot to death, and continue that mode of retaliation until the object was effected; but never would I consent to the slow system of destroying life by starvation or by cruelty in any form. The details, however, are a matter of military discretion when the authority shall be given.

Mr. HENDERSON. Permit me to ask the Senator under what authority the retaliation practiced by General Foster, of which he speaks, was adopted before Congress acted upon the subject. If Congress has entire power over the question and Congress has not directed retaliation to be exercised, how could an officer in the field undertake to say that he would retaliate in the way the Senator has stated?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. He took the responsibility of doing it; that is all I can say on the subject. I confess I had supposed that discretion was in the commanders of our armies; but now I have doubts on the subject after hearing this discussion, and seeing the laws which were passed by our fathers and our forefathers in 1813 and 1799.

Mr. HENDERSON. I can tell the Senator that the military commanders in the West have exercised the power since the beginning of the war. It has never been doubted there.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise merely to express to the honorable member from Wisconsin the opinion that I have no doubt that Congress can, under the constitutional provision to which he has referred, legislate on the subject of the exchange of prisoners and the treatment of prisoners, and that is what Congress did by the acts of 1799 and 1813; and looking to those acts alone, not having any other information on the subject than those acts give, the inference which my friend draws would be a legitimate one, that they were enacted under the impression that retaliation could not be resorted to except under the authority of Congress. Now, I suppose nothing to be clearer than that the retaliation spoken of in the books is a retaliation to be exercised when necessary, and that therefore it is a duty of the military officer conducting the war, unless he is restrained by some paramount authority, to enforce it in proper cases. One of the modes of making the war efficient on his part is to retaliate on the prisoners he may capture what may have been done toward his men who may have been captured by the enemy.

Now, the honorable member refers to the articles Congress has adopted as rules for the government of the Army and Navy of the United States. I am sure he will say that there are many provisions in those rules and regulations that are not at all necessary. One of the rules is that prisoners when they are taken are to be disarmed. I suppose that could be done without the authority of an act of Congress. Another is that they are to obey orders. Nobody can doubt that they would be compelled to obey orders, although there was no act of Congress on the subject. There is the same right to disarm prisoners after they are captured as there is to capture them. I do not suppose any legislation by Congress is necessary to give the authority to capture them. The Army have the same authority to capture them, no greater authority than they have to carry on the war upon the battle-field and kill the enemy if they cannot capture them. No regulation by Congress is necessary to give an officer authority to fight the foe and to kill him in fight, if killing should become necessary.

The meaning of the clause referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin is that Congress may regulate the manner in which the Army shall be organized, how it shall conduct its general duties; but when once upon the field, the officer in command may do anything and everything that is the duty of military officers, unless he is prohibited by a superior authority. General Washington threatened retaliation, and to a certain extent retaliation was practiced during the war of the Revolution; but it was not necessary to give him that authority. General Jackson practiced retaliation during the war of 1812. Nobody supposed he had not the authority to retaliate; the only question was, whether he had not abused the power. It was not denied that he had the power to do what he did, provided the case was one to justify retaliation to that extent. I have supposed that power to be very clear, and on that ground I thought it was unnecessary to legislate on the subject, provided we had confidence in the President that he would perform his duty. I think it is the President's duty, if he cannot protect our men who have been captured except by retaliation on the men of the enemy who have been captured by us, to retaliate to the extent that the laws of nations authorize; and all that, I think, can be done by the President without any legislation.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am very glad that this debate has disclosed one fact, and that is, that many members of the Senate think there is some limit to the powers of the Executive. I had supposed, from the manner in which he has acted in my State and in the State of Maryland, to say nothing of his actions elsewhere, that he supposed himself to be omnipotent. I am glad to learn today that in the opinion of some of his warmest friends there are limitations upon his power.

I shall vote for this reference; but I do not know that I shall vote for any proposition that may come from the committee recognizing or countenancing the principle of retaliation, for I am one of those who do not believe that the American people, either North or South, as a general thing are so cruel, so wicked, as willfully to treat barbarously prisoners of war. I doubt not that there are individual cases of great oppression and great hardship. I doubt not that when those who have never been used to wielding authority become dressed up in a little brief authority they do on some occasions not only play fantastic but very cruel tricks; and I doubt not that there are Federal prisoners who have suffered cruelty at the hands of some wicked, cruel southern officers; and I doubt not that there are confederate prisoners who, when they have fallen into the hands and into the charge of wicked and cruel northern officers, have been treated barbarously also. I suspect that if the account was balanced, there would not be much difference. I, for one, do not believe that people of the South or the people of the North, in the main, are such cruel wretches as that they would willfully treat prisoners of war with cruelty, and for that reason do not believe there is any necessity for passing any act or doing anything giving authority to the President to retaliate, or recognizing the principle of retaliation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I rise to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer an amendment that it may go to the committee, provided the resolution and amendments heretofore offered shall be recommitted. I will read it:

And be it further resolved, That the President is directed to take such proper measures as may be necessary to obtain the earliest exchange of prisoners at all times during the continuance of the war.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposition will be received informally, to go with the other proposed amendments if the resolution shall be recommitted.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WADE. Let us have the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa to withdraw his motion, so that I may offer a motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HARLAN. I have no objection to that motion being received unanimously.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It cannot be received except by unanimous consent.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. WADE. It cannot be received at all now. Let us have the question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I care nothing about it myself. I only want to accommodate my friends.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion to adjourn.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll. Before the result was announced,

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to ask one question: whether the Senator who made this motion desires to speak on this subject?

Mr. HARLAN. I expected to address the Senate for a short time; but I can go on to-night if such be the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the delay proposed will be granted.

Mr. COLLAMER. I think the usual courtesy ought to be extended to the Senator from Iowa, if he desires time. I change my vote to the affirmative.

Mr. POMEROY and Mr. SPRAGUE also changed their votes from the negative to the affirmative.

Mr. WADE. If the Senator from Iowa wishes to address the Senate on this subject, I will not persist in opposing an adjournment. I change my vote to the affirmative.

Messrs. ANTHONY, CLARK, FARWELL, LANE of Indiana, NESMITH, SAULSBURY, and WILSON also changed their votes from the negative to the affirmative.

Mr. POMEROY. Before the result is announced, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. WADE and Mr. CLARK. That cannot be done.

The vote on the motion to adjourn was announced—yeas 24, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Doolittle, Farwell, Foster, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Pomero, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Foot, Hicks, Howard, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wilkinson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Howe, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, and Richardson—8.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

Mr. HALE also, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution to refer the claim of George Ashley, administrator de bonis non of Samuel Holgate, deceased, back to the Court of Claims; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved that the vote by which the resolution was passed be reconsidered, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DANFORD MOTT.

Mr. HALE also, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution to refer the claim of Danford Mott to the Court of Claims; which was read a first and second time.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JURISDICTION OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. HALE also, from the same committee, reported a bill supplementary to the act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims," &c., passed July 4, 1864; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HALE. I desire to have this bill considered now.

The bill provides that the provisions of the act passed July 4, 1864, entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished the Army of the United States," be extended so as to embrace all claims of teamsters, laborers, and for hauling supplies to the Army on the same terms and restrictions as are contained in the bill to which this is a supplement.

Mr. STEVENS. Do I understand that this is further to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims?

Mr. HALE. No, sir. We passed a bill last session allowing the quartermaster to settle certain claims for supplies furnished for the Army. This bill proposes to allow the quartermaster to settle the claims of teamsters and laborers. It enlarges the jurisdiction of the quartermaster.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, I think that is right. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES A. PITCHER.

Mr. HALE also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, bill of the Senate No. 338, for the relief of Charles A. Pitcher.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the bill be considered now.

The bill was read. It authorizes and requires the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Charles A. Pitcher the sum of $5,000 for damages sustained by reason of an infringement of his patent in machinery for making brooms, and the use of the same in the penitentiaries of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. That bill makes an appropriation, and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole. I object to its consideration in the House now.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

CAPTAIN GARDIN CHAPIN.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, bill of the Senate No. 107, for the relief of Captain Gardin Chapin, seventh United States infantry, for private property lost and destroyed in the evacuation of Arizona by the United States troops.

ISRAEL DEMING.

Mr. HOLMAN also, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of Israel Deming, praying for reimbursement for losses sustained by congressional legislation in regard to the currency; which was laid on the table.

P. CHAMBERLAIN.

COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Commerce Senate bill No. 310, for the promotion of commerce and the improvement of navigation, and asked that the bill be printed and recommitted, and that a minority report be also received and printed. It was so ordered.

PORT OF PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, a bill to enlarge the port of entry and delivery for the district of Philadelphia.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. That is not a private bill. I object to its being reported now.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. This bill should have been reported some days ago, when the Committee on Commerce was called; but through some inadvertence it was not reported. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his objection.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. What action does the gentleman propose to have taken with this bill?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I propose to have it considered and passed now.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The bill requires unanimous consent to be reported this day, it being a public bill.

WASHINGTON GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill No. 363, to amend the charter of the Washington Gas-Light Company.

The bill was read. It repeals so much of the acts of June 25, 1860, and July 11, 1862, as relate to the price of gas furnished by the Washington Gas-Light Company, and amends the act incorporating the Washington Gas-Light Company so as to prohibit the said company from receiving, on and after the 1st of December, 1864, for the benefit of its stockholders, a greater price for gas than forty cents per hundred cubic feet, subject to a discount of ten per cent. on all bills for gas furnished to the General Government, and of five per cent. on all bills for gas furnished to other consumers, if paid at the office of the company within seven days after the rendition thereof.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is that a private bill?

The SPEAKER. It is, according to the usage of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope it will not be passed on now.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will allow the bill to pass. I am sure that if he investigated the facts, he would not object. The stock of the company has been reduced, as I understand, from above par to twenty-three per cent.; and the company is losing from five to six thousand dollars a month, and will be compelled, inevitably, to close up its business unless this bill be passed. I know of some gentlemen who have invested their savings for years in the stock of this company, and who will lose their investment if the bill be not passed. I do not think that this is an overgrown, plethoric corporation, or one that should be regarded with any vindictive feeling.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I desire to have the bill put upon its passage; and after submitting a few remarks, I will move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon the call for the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I withdraw the call for the previous question, and yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DAWES addressed the Chair.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] for one moment, while I examine the provisions of the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I think, Mr. Speaker, that if my friend from Illinois would examine the merits of this case he would withdraw his objection to this bill. I am sure that at the last session I was quite as much prejudiced against this measure as the gentleman appears to be; and it is only after some patient, and I believe thorough and impartial, examination of the merits of the case, that I have come to the conclusion that we did injustice to this company last year by refusing to pass this or a similar bill. I believe that any one who will fairly investigate the matter will be convinced that the present charter of this company limits the price of gas below the rate at which it is possible for them at this time to manufacture and distribute it about this city. I do think that this company are not now asking anything unreasonable in seeking legislation that will allow them to charge a remunerative price for the gas which they manufacture.

I do not know anything about the provisions of this bill in detail. I assume that the purpose of the bill is simply to remove the restriction now contained in the charter of this company upon the price of gas. Now, sir, I do not think it reasonable to make a discrimination against this company, and compel them to manufacture gas at a rate below that for which it can be manufactured elsewhere. I cannot understand why this company should not be permitted to raise the price of the article, when all the materials used in its manufacture have greatly advanced in cost. I do not see any justice in legislation which would prevent an advance in price proportionate to the increased cost of manufacture.

It is certainly proper that we should retain our control over this company, so that they may not be allowed to raise the price of gas beyond a rate which would give a fairly remunerative compensation to the stockholders. But to keep the limitation of price at the same point at which it was fixed before the war must obviously be to every candid mind manifestly unjust. There is no article of consumption in this country that has not risen in price since the war began. The price of many things has doubled, and the price of some has trebled or quadrupled. I do not understand why we should refuse to this company permission to raise the price of the gas which they furnish, in proportion to the cost of everything else.

If there should be, in the details of the bill, anything objectionable, I will cheerfully cooperate with my friend from Illinois in strictly guarding the rights of the public. But unless he can specify some objectionable feature, he should not, I submit, oppose this bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the argument made by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] in favor of this bill would, in its legitimate application, reach far beyond this case. If we commence on this system we may as well go through and raise our own salaries and those of all the officers of the Government. That is what the argument amounts to.

Now, sir, if this bill is to be passed, I propose to offer some amendments, in which I have no doubt the House will concur.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to ask my friend from Illinois a question: does he desire to compel this company to manufacture gas for less than its cost?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not know that I have any particular desire about it one way or the other.

Mr. DAWES. I submit to my friend that he ought to have.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This company can stop making gas at any time they please, and we can fall back on kerosene, thus encouraging the great petroleum interest of Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEVENS. We can make gas a great deal cheaper than they can.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. And not quite so good either, bad as this may be.

Now, sir, I do not understand from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES], or the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS], that, before the recent rise in the materials for the manufacture of gas, this company was not a paying institution; and I trust that if this bill be passed at all, it will be passed with the limitation which we have placed on all such bills, that at a given time hereafter the company shall go back to its present status. But in the mean time I ask the Clerk to read from the Washington Chronicle of to-day a communication which represents the feelings of the people of the city of Washington, who are paying for this gas.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I do not think that we should have read here against this bill an anonymous communication from an irresponsible source.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The House can take it for what it is worth. I ask the Clerk to read it as part of my speech.

The Clerk read, as follows:

MORE BAD GAS.

To the Editor of the Chronicle:

For several days the miserable stuff palmed off on this city and the Government by the Washington Gas-Light Company, which they call "gas," has been of such a noxious character as will most certainly produce a pestilence unless the evil be speedily remedied. Some of our citizens were obliged, on Sunday evening, to vacate their rooms on "lighting up," and resort to kerosene and candles for light. In the city post office, where they are obliged to burn more or less gas day and night, the stench was indeed most horrible.

Had this been the first time this nuisance has been inflicted upon us, we would have taken the apology of the company, and its published promises to do better in future, as sufficient, and remained silent; but these promises have been broken time and again, and now that point has been reached "where forbearance ceases to be a virtue," and when duty as public journalists and a proper regard for the health of the people of this metropolis require us to speak out.

The company is now asking authority from Congress to increase the price of gas about fifty per cent. This reminds us of the story of the "Frenchman and the poker," and of the stanza of Burns, in his famous lyric of "Death and Dr. Hornbook," where "Death" is lamenting that his power to kill had been usurped by the doctor, who, although he dispenses such nostrums as result in sending his patients to their "lang hame," takes good care that he is "weel paid" for his prescriptions. Death is made to say:

"That's just a swatch o' Hornbook's way;
Thus goes he on from day to day;
Thus does he poison, kill, an' slay,
An's weel paid for't;
Yet stops me o' my lawfu' prey
Wi' his d—d dirt."

Now, we object, in the first place, to taking poison, but if compelled to swallow the dose, we enter our solemn protest against paying two prices to any individual or corporation that has the power to force down our throats the fatal prescription.

This company has a perfect monopoly of gas in this city, and manages to prevent the introduction of other gas by an organized opposition to the chartering of any other company on just and equitable principles. We are, therefore, compelled to use whatever it thinks proper to furnish, or go without light. In other cities such things would not exist a single day. Why cannot Washington be relieved from the oppression as well as if it were located further north? It remains for Congress to decide.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to add the following proviso to the bill, and on that amendment demanded the previous question:

Provided, That the provisions of this bill shall not be extended beyond the 1st day of July, 1866.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, I hope that the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The amendment allows the operation of the bill to the 1st day of July, 1866, one year and a half, and by that time we hope that the cost of materials will go down so that the company can go on as formerly.

Mr. KERNAN. I wish to put a question. If the amendment is adopted will not the company be entirely unrestricted as to the price of gas after the 1st of July, 1866?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I propose to offer another amendment to cure that objection.

Mr. WILSON. I see that this bill refers back to the month of December last. Now, is it intended that we shall pay this additional price from December last, or only from the passage of this act?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. The bills up to January have all been paid.

Mr. WILSON. Then that part of the bill ought to be stricken out.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I now demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER stated that the gentleman from New York, having reported the bill, was entitled to the floor to close the debate.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Mr. Speaker, the bill which is now presented before the House is entitled to the fair, candid, and just consideration of members. It is not, as alleged by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], a monopoly that we desire to benefit; it is simply to do an act of justice, as this body with the Senate is the legislature for the District of Columbia, and to which all interests here must appeal for aid and protection.

In the year 1860, before the war broke out, by the laws of Congress the gas company, for furnishing gas to the city and the District, was authorized to charge $3 50 per thousand feet. That was when coal was five dollars a ton, when labor was one dollar a day, and when all the materials which went toward the production of gas were far lower in price than they are to-day. They have advanced since 1860 nearly three hundred per cent. In 1861 Congress reduced the price of gas somewhat. We find that coal has been advancing, labor has been advancing, and that iron and lime and everything consumed by this company have been advancing in price, so that the compensation which this company is entitled to receive, under the laws of the United States, for gas furnished to the Government and citizens of this District, will not pay the cost of production. And this is without reference to taxes, the capital invested, and the salaries paid to those engaged in the management of the corporation.

I beg leave to call the attention of the House to the fact that in 1862 coal was selling in this city to this company at $8 50 per ton, and to-day it costs $16 50 per ton at the yard of the company. Labor, too, has gone up to twenty shillings per day. Iron has gone up from one and a half cent per pound to four cents per pound, and so on with reference to all the other materials which enter into the production of gas. The advance upon coal alone is $8 50 per ton, or one hundred per cent.

Mr. Speaker, in every city of this Union where the charters limit the price of gas, the price has been advanced one hundred per cent. since 1860. If I may be allowed I will refer to the prices now charged by some of the gas companies in various parts of the United States, and compare them with the price charged here. And I beg leave to call the attention of the House to the fact that there is scarcely a city where coal costs so much as it does here. In the city of Portland, Maine, the price of gas has been raised to $5 15 per thousand feet, although in 1862 it was four dollars, which is the price now asked to be granted to this company. In the city of Portland coal costs six dollars or more less than it does in the city of Washington. The price of gas in Portland, as I stated, was $5 15 a thousand feet. In the city of Syracuse, which is the place of my residence, gas was sold in 1862, according to the authority of the corporation, at three dollars per thousand, and that price has been increased from time to time since until the company now receive $4 50 per thousand without any discount except five per cent. when paid within five days after the bills are rendered. And yet in Syracuse coal costs eleven dollars per ton, and labor costs ten shillings per day.

I might go on to enumerate a large number of other companies that have increased their charges for gas between 1863 and the present time; but I will detain the House with the reading of only two or three letters upon this subject. I ask the Clerk to read first a letter from the Burlington, Iowa, Gas-Light Company.

The letter was read, as follows:

OFFICE GAS-LIGHT COMPANY,
BURLINGTON, IOWA, November 21, 1864.

DEAR SIR: Yours of 7th instant, inquiring about price of gas, cost of coal, &c., is received.

Our present price is $1 50 per thousand feet, an advance of fifty cents upon former price. No further advance is contemplated at present. No discount for any cause.

Coal costs us $6 50 at gas works, but is of inferior quality, making only from two thirds to three fourths as much gas as Youghiogheny coal.

Respectfully yours,
R. SPENCER,
Secretary Burlington Gas-Light Company.

J. F. BROWN, Esq., Secretary.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I now ask the Clerk to read a letter from the Cumberland Gas-Light Company, located in the midst of a coal region.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CUMBERLAND GAS-LIGHT COMPANY,
CUMBERLAND, MARYLAND, November 18, 1864.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 7th instant is at hand. Our charge for gas has uniformly been four dollars per thousand feet, without any discount for prompt payment. We have not contemplated as yet any increase in price, although the cost of coal and other items of expense are much enhanced. We propose, at least, to add to the above price the United States tax.

Yours respectfully,
JOSEPH SHRIVER, Secretary.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I have also a letter from the Manhattan Gas-Light Company, of New York.

The letter was read, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE MANHATTAN GAS-LIGHT COMPANY,
IRVING PLACE, CORNER EAST FIFTEENTH STREET,
NEW YORK, November 11, 1864.

DEAR SIR: Your esteemed favor of the 7th is received. Our position is precisely as it was when I saw you in Washington last winter. We get $2 50 per thousand feet for gas sold. We expect prompt payment and make no discounts. We charge meter rent. Our charter allows us to charge meter rent, but fixes the price of gas. All gas companies, by law, may charge meter rent in this State, but some companies have bound themselves in their contracts with the local authorities not to make such a charge.

We intend to make application to the Legislature in January next for the removal of the restriction as to price. If successful, the price will be in accordance with the cost, and that cost no man can now foresee. But we are doing an unprofitable business now.

Truly yours,
CHARLES ROOME,
J. F. BROWN, Esq.,
Secretary Washington Gas-Light Company.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. That is a letter from the president of a company whose charge for gas is limited by its charter. That company is allowed to charge only $2 50 per thousand feet, and they are now before the Legislature of New York for relief. They have been suffering from the enhanced price of labor, and have done an unprofitable business, and yet they had a vast accumulation of coal on hand, so that they were able for two years to supply themselves with coal at a moderate price. But I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that in the city of Philadelphia, where there is the same limitation upon the gas companies, and where they were not supplied with a stock of coal on hand, the loss of the company in a single year, was upward of eighty-four thousand dollars. I ask the clerk to read a letter from the Philadelphia Gas Works Company.

The letter was read, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE PHILADELPHIA GAS WORKS,
November 28, 1864.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 7th instant is received, and contents noted. I would state in reply that the works in this city were formerly private corporations; were purchased by the city; and are now managed by a trust—and as we supply the citizens at cost, after setting aside a small percentage as a sinking fund for payments of loans—the price charged by us would be no criterion for you.

We charged last year $2 25 per thousand feet, less one ninth for payment within five days, subject to the United States tax, and sunk about eighty thousand dollars on the years' business. On the 1st of January, 1864, the price was advanced to $2 50 per thousand feet, less five per cent., subject to the tax, and fearing that that price was not sufficient, a further advance was made September 1st to three dollars per thousand feet, less five per cent., and subject to the tax; and we have serious doubts whether that is sufficient to meet the expenses of the works.

Hoping this may be satisfactory, I remain yours, very respectfully,

THOMAS S. STEWART,
Chief Engineer.
Per THOMAS R. BROWN,
Chief Clerk of Works.

J. F. BROWN, Secretary of Washington Gas-Light Company.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I beg the House to bear in mind one established fact connected with this question, to which I will advert in reply to an allegation contained in an anonymous communication presented to the House this morning. The location of Washington compels it to depend for its supply of coal principally upon the railroad which enters the District from western Maryland and eastern Virginia and upon the canal. Those roads and the canal have been broken up by the events of the war, and the gas company has been unable to obtain supplies of coal from the sources to which they usually look. It has been unable to obtain a supply in New York, Philadelphia, or other places, for the reason that coal was not there to be sold at any price. And from that fact has grown the complaint contained in that anonymous communication; because the company, being unable to obtain at the time coal suitable for gas purposes, were compelled to take a cargo of inferior and coarser coal, though they had to pay for it an exorbitant price.

I do not wish to consume the time of the House in reading unnecessary communications upon this subject, though I have before me letters from companies in almost all parts of the country, in which they say, with one accord, that the companies have been compelled, by reason of the enhanced cost of material, to raise the price of gas about one hundred per cent.

I desire now to submit to the House a statement made by the President of this Washington company of its operations for the last six months.

B. H. BARTOL, President.

City of Philadelphia, ss:

B. H. Bartol, being duly sworn according to law, saith that he is President of the Washington Gas Works, and that the within statement is correct and true in every particular.

B. H. BARTOL.

Sworn and subscribed before me this 10th day of January, A. D. 1865. JOHN WHITE, Alderman.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. That expresses the condition of the company. They have been losing money for the last two years, and they have been furnishing gas under these enhanced prices of materials to the Government and to the citizens; and the question now is whether we, as the legislators of the District, are willing to be to them the ministers of injustice, compelling them to abandon the works they have constructed, or else to furnish gas to the Government and the people of Washington at a great loss.

Mr. UPSON. I would ask the gentleman whether dividends have not been privately paid by the company.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Not a dollar.

Mr. UPSON. I understand such is the case.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I deny it, and on the authority of gentlemen who have no interest to make a misstatement to this House. This company has been charged with bad faith on the floor of this House. Such charges have been made unjustly, and for the purpose, I have no doubt, of inciting prejudice against this company. Sir, I know of no corporation in this District whose affairs have been managed with greater ability and honesty than the affairs of this gas company which has been assailed. We alone can furnish them with the relief necessary for their protection; and shall we listen to these imputations of bad faith, which are made without foundation and for the purpose of depriving them of justice at the hands of the American Congress? I hope, sir, that we shall not witness such a scene as that upon this floor.

I have been surprised, I must say, that all measures of legislation affecting the District of Columbia, no matter how excellent or just they may have been, have been assailed by members upon this floor from motives which I cannot understand, and especially by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN]; but I have been less surprised at the attacks of that gentleman upon everything within this District since I have found everything without the District attacked in the same way. Sir, we are here to do justice and not wrong. We are here to protect rights and interests, and as this company can look to no other source for protection, I appeal to the members of this House to lay aside these unfounded prejudices that have been instilled into their minds, and to give them that justice which their circumstances demand.

Mr. PATTERSON addressed the Chair.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I decline to yield.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been seconded, no further debate is in order.

Mr. PATTERSON. Is it in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. PATTERSON. Then I make that motion. I merely wish to say a word or two.

The question was taken, and the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question being upon the amendment proposed by Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays and called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. DAVIS, of New York, and WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—yeas 21, noes 69.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 36, nays 103, not voting 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Boutwell, Cobb, Cole, Cravens, Donnelly, Eckley, Farnsworth, Frank, Harding, Holman, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, McBride, Samuel F. Miller, Daniel Morris, Norton, Odell, Orth, Patterson, Perham, James S. Rollins, Sloan, Spalding, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, and Elihu B. Washburne—36.

NAVS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boyd, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chesler, Ambrose W. Davis, Davies, Dawson, Denning, Denison, Dixon, Driggs, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Eliot, Finck, Ganson, Garfield, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Rollins, Ross, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Starr, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Stuart, Sweat, Thayer, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—103.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Allison, Blaine, Brandegee, Brooks, Coffroth, Dumont, English, Grinnell, Hale, Hall, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Hubbard, Hutchins, Kasson, Knapp, Littlejohn, Marey, McAlister, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, Amos Myers, Perry, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Strouse, Townsend, Voorhees, Ward, Chilton A. White, Wilder, Benjamin Wood, Worthington, and Yocaman—43.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof, the bill was passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROPOSITION TO ADJOURN OVER.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday.

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask the gentleman to allow me one moment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. For what purpose?

Mr. ASHLEY. I want to make a proposition that the House meet to-morrow for general debate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If it be desired that there shall be a session to-morrow for debate, with the understanding that no business shall be done, I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio suggests that to-morrow be set apart for debate on the pending constitutional amendment only, and that no business shall be transacted. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. ASHLEY. I hope not. There are a number of young members here who have prepared speeches, and who desire an opportunity to deliver them.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Well, in that case, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. Does the gentleman propose that debate shall be closed to-morrow?

Mr. ASHLEY. Oh no.

No further objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

BUSINESS ON SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has expired.

Mr. HALE. Then I move to proceed to the consideration of private business on the Speaker's table; so that the bills to which there shall be objection shall be referred, and that those to which there shall be no objection may be put upon their passage.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I suggest that the proper motion would be to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. On Fridays and Saturdays the motion to proceed to private business on the Speaker's table takes precedence of the other motion.

The question was taken on Mr. HALE's motion, and it was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed an act (H. R. No. 709) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1865, with an amendment, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY.

The next private bill on the Speaker's table was an act (H. R. No. 623) to amend an act entitled an act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company, in the District of Columbia, approved July 1, 1864; the question being on the Senate amendment to strike out "ten" and insert "thirty;" so that it will read "that the line from Seventeenth street to the Capitol shall be completed, equipped, and running, within thirty days from the passage of this act."

The amendment was concurred in.

POTOMAC FERRY RAILROAD COMPANY.

The next private bill on the Speaker's table was an act (H. R. No. 186) to incorporate the Baltimore and Washington Depot and Potomac Railroad Company, with amendments by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REUBEN CLOUGH.

The next private bill on the Speaker's table was an act (H. R. No. 316) for the relief of Reuben Clough; the question being on an amendment by the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The motion was agreed to.

REBECCA S. HARRISON.

The next private bill on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 347) for the relief of Rebecca S. Harrison.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ALEXANDER J. ATOCHA.

The next private bill on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 281) for the relief of Alexander J. Atocha.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

EDMUND S. ZEVELEY.

The next private bill on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 395) for the relief of Edmund S. Zeveley.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

SPENCER AND HUBBARD.

The next private bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 136) for the relief of A. T. Spencer and Gurdon S. Hubbard.

HENRY A. BRIGHAM.

The next private bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 212) for the relief of Henry A. Brigham.

The bill was read a first and second time. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay to Henry A. Brigham $2,000, being the amount of his check drawn in favor of the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at New York, on the 7th of November, 1862.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. This is an appropriation bill, and if any member objects, must be considered first in the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to its consideration now, and move that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I should like to explain the circumstances connected with this bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not now before the House, it having been referred to the Committee on Claims on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] The gentleman can make his statement by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. The reference of the bill is simply in accordance with the usual practice. The amount proposed to be appropriated is considerable.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I am sure that the House would not hesitate to pass the bill if the circumstances were fully understood. But I will not debate the measure now, if the gentleman from Indiana desires that it shall be examined by the Committee of Claims.

JOHN HASTINGS.

The next private bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 274) for the relief of John Hastings, collector of the port of Pittsburgh.

The bill was read a first and second time. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed, in adjusting the accounts of John Hastings, as collector of the customs at the port of Pittsburgh, to give him credit for $9,956 62, the amount of the public money of which he was robbed on the 10th of March, 1854, while acting in the aforesaid capacity.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object to that.

MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. DRIGGS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate amendments to a joint resolution (H. R. No. 99) "reserving mineral lands from the operation of all acts passed at the present session granting lands or extending the time of former grants." I desire that the House shall concur in the amendments, which are unimportant.

Mr. HALE. Will the matter give rise to debate?

Mr. DRIGGS. No, sir.

There was no objection; and the House proceeded to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate; which were read, as follows:

Strike out the words "present session" and insert "first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress," and add to the resolution "unless otherwise specially provided in the act or acts making the grant;" so as to make the resolution read:

"That no act passed at the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress granting lands to States or corporations to aid in the construction of roads, and for other purposes, or to extend the time of grants heretofore made, shall be so construed as to embrace mineral lands, which in all cases shall be and are reserved exclusively to the United States, unless otherwise specially provided in the act or acts making the grant."

Strike out in the title the words "present session" and insert "first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress."

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] will explain this matter.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

MONDAY, JANUARY 30, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 30.

Mr. DRIGGS. I will do so. This joint resolution was reported at the last session from the Committee on Public Lands, in order to protect mineral lands from the operation of land grants. It was passed by the House, was sent to the Senate, and passed there; but, being overlooked, it was not returned to the House. The Senate has again passed it at the present session.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now have a full recollection of the matter. The gentleman has stated the facts correctly; and I have no doubt that the amendments of the Senate should be concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. DRIGGS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF ARSENAL FROM ST. LOUIS.

Mr. BLOW. I ask unanimous consent of the House to take up Senate bill No. 402, to repeal an act entitled "An act to remove the United States arsenal from the city of St. Louis, and providing for selling the lands upon which the same is located."

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I object.

DISQUALIFICATION OF COLOR.

Mr. ALLEY. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill No. 62, to remove the disqualification of color in carrying the mails, for reference to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I object.

POST ROAD.

Mr. SMITH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish a certain post road; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Is it a private bill?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is not.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Then I object.

SWEENEY, RITTENHOUSE, FANT AND CO.

Mr. UPSON. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the claim of Sweeney, Rittenhouse, Fant & Co., reported to this House by the Court of Claims in January, 1862, be referred back to said court.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that that should be referred by a joint resolution. If it is put in that form I suppose there will be no objection to it.

Mr. UPSON. I have no objection to that.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the regular order of business.

PAYMENTS TO ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the House, showing the payments made to the Illinois Central Railroad Company since the passage of the resolution by the House at the last session; which, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

NORTON'S POST-MARK STAMP.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting additional papers in regard to Norton's post-mark stamp; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

OBJECTION DAY.

Mr. HALL moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, (Mr. J. C. ALLEN in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that this was objection day.

ALEXANDER F. PRATT.

A bill (H. R. No. 574) for the relief of Alexander F. Pratt.

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay Alexander F. Pratt $530, for pursuing and capturing Elijah K. Janner, convicted of counterfeiting United States coin.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. As there is no report I will, by unanimous consent, make a brief statement. The bill provides for the payment of the expenses of retaking a prisoner convicted by the United States court and confined in Waukegan jail. Mr. Pratt, who was sheriff, expended that amount in the recovery of the prisoner. He presented his claim to the Legislature of Wisconsin, believing they were immediately responsible to him, and that the United States was responsible to them. They examined into the claim and addressed a memorial to Congress requesting that it should be paid. I know some of the circumstances, and have every reason to believe that the bill is a just one.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

FRIENDLY SIOUX.

An act (S. No. 225) for the relief of certain friendly Indians of the Sioux nation in Minnesota.

The bill provides that whereas certain Indians of the Sioux nation did, during the outbreak in Minnesota in 1862, at the risk of their lives, aid in saving many white men, women, and children from being massacred, and in consequence of such action were compelled to abandon their homes and property, and are now entirely destitute of the means of support, the President of the United States be authorized and requested to cause an examination to be made in relation to all the facts pertaining to the action of the Indians, and to make such provisions for their welfare as their necessities and future protection may require; and for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the sum of $7,500 be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; one third of the sum to be paid and expended for the benefit of Am-pe-tu-to-ke-cha, or John Other-day, and the remainder for the benefit of such other Indians as shall appear specially entitled thereto, for their friendly, extraordinary, and gallant services in rescuing white settlers from massacre in Minnesota; provided that not more than the sum of $500 shall be expended for any one Indian; except the chief above mentioned; and that the Secretary of the Interior shall report to the next Congress the names of the Indians for whose benefit the same shall be expended, and the amount expended for each.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

A bill (H. R. No. 624) to provide for the payment of the value of certain lands and improvements of private citizens appropriated by the United States for Indian reservations in the Territory of Washington.

The bill appropriates $18,611 62, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of paying for the lands and improvements of private citizens, taken and appropriated by order of the Department of the Interior for Indian reservations and uses in the Territory of Washington; and the claims herein provided to be paid shall be allowed and paid in such manner and upon such proofs of the value of the property as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. McBRIDE. Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the committee I will state the facts in reference to the bill. In the years 1856-57 the Indian department instructed the superintendent of Indian affairs in Washington Territory to make certain reservations upon which to place the Indians with whom treaties had been made, and by which treaties these Indians were to be provided with and supported upon reserves. Under these instructions the superintendent of Indian affairs made several reservations, nearly all of them including within their limits the lands of private individuals. Some of these parties had acquired titles under the donation and preemption laws, while others had not. As it became necessary to turn them out of their lands and improvements the Department ordered an investigation into their value in order to determine upon the proper restitution. In fixing the value the referees were composed of three of the best citizens, who were sworn and made up their judgment upon testimony of sworn witnesses and returned the facts to the superintendent of Indian affairs. The investigation on the part of the Department was very minute and full, and the amount fixed in the bill is exactly the sum which it recommends for the payment of these claims. These claims have the indorsement of the superintendent of Indian affairs of Washington Territory, are approved by the authorities in Washington, and after a full examination by the Committee on Indian Affairs I was ordered unanimously to report the claims to this House and ask an appropriation for their payment. As there can be no question about the justice and propriety of paying these claims I hope the bill will be suffered to pass without objection. I have only to add that in fixing the amounts I find by consulting the papers that the authorities have not recommended payment for anything but the improvements on lands, except in those cases where the parties have shown that they had completed a title to their lands themselves. I trust, sir, that the justice of this bill will insure its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

HULL AND COZZENS, AND OTHERS.

A bill (H. R. No. 713) for the relief of Hull & Cozzens, and John Naylor & Co.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle the accounts of Hull & Cozzens under a contract with Mark W. Izzard, Governor of the Territory of Nebraska, dated the 28th of November, 1855; and the accounts of John Naylor & Co., under a similar contract, dated February 25, 1856, for furnishing materials for the capitol building at Omaha City, Nebraska Territory, and to pay to them, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, any balance which may be found due them on their said contracts.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

BENJAMIN ROACH.

A bill (H. R. No. 149) for the relief of Benjamin Roach.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. HALE. There is a letter on file from General Grant relating to this subject. He says the claim should be paid.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

CHARLES A. FITCHER.

An act (S. No. 338) for the relief of Charles A. Fitcher. [Objected to by Mr. BOUTWELL.]

J. J. LINTS.

A bill (H. R. No. 717) for the relief of J. J. Lints.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has this bill, with the report, been printed?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think these bills and reports ought to be printed before being acted on. I do not know but this claim is just; but I do not think the House should act except upon printed papers; and therefore I object.

WIDOW OF JOHN A. STEVENS.

A bill (H. R. No. 626) for the relief of the widow and heirs of John A. Stevens, deceased, of Springfield, Missouri.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This bill involves an important question which is now under consideration, and I therefore object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Calendar has been gone over once, and the Clerk will now commence the Calendar again, and five objections will be necessary, under the rules, to defeat a bill.

BENJAMIN GRATZ.

A bill (H. R. No. 385) for the relief of Benjamin Gratz. [Objected to by five members.]

HUGH LEDDY.

A bill (H. R. No. 386) for the relief of Hugh Leddy.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. HALE. I wish to say that this claim has been indorsed by the Secretary of War and by the Solicitor of the War Department.

The bill was objected to by five members.

Mr. HALE. If all bills are to be objected to, without reference to their merits, there is no use of going on.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

JAMES NOKES.

A bill (H. R. No. 439) for the relief of James Nokes. [Objected to by five members.]

HEIRS OF JOHN E. BOULIGNY.

LOUIS ROBERTS.

An act (S. No. 234) for the relief of Louis Roberts.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Louis Roberts, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $2,740 99, that being the amount of money advanced by said Roberts, out of his own means, to replace certain Indian indemnity goods accidentally destroyed by fire in November, 1855, while being transported by him from St. Paul, Minnesota, to Redwood agency, for R. G. Murphy, United States Indian agent for the Sioux Indians in Minnesota.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

LOGAN HUNTON.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 73) for the relief of Logan Hunton.

Mr. WILSON and four other members objected.

Mr. MALLORY. May I be allowed to appeal to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] to withdraw that objection? I had not supposed it would come from a distinguished lawyer like the gentleman from Iowa, who must know from his own experience the propriety of making this payment.

Mr. WILSON. I am satisfied with the compliment already paid, and must insist on my objection.

Mr. MALLORY. Then I withdraw the compliment. [Laughter.]

COLUMBIA BANK.

A bill (H. R. No. 457) for the relief of the Columbia Bank. [Objected to by five members.]

Mr. HALE. I am instructed by the Committee of Claims to offer an amendment, as an additional section to that bill, providing for the payment of the claims of other parties who suffered losses at the same time.

By unanimous consent the amendment was received and considered as pending.

Several MEMBERS objected.

A bill (H. R. No. 459) for the relief of O. B. & O. S. Latham. [Objected to by five members.]

HOOPER AND WILLIAMS, AND OTHERS.

A bill (H. R. No. 462) for the relief of Hooper & Williams, Livingston, Kincaid & Company, Gilbert & Gerrish, and others. [Objected to by five members.]

Mr. STEVENS. I would inquire of my colleague if he desires to proceed any further with this business?

Mr. HALE. I think we may as well go on.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to take up an appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. I want to see if the House intends to pass any private bills at all.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the gentleman must be almost satisfied upon that point by this time.

Mr. HALE. I think they ought to be considered at all events.

Mr. STEVENS. Very well, I will not insist.

AMBROSE MORRISON.

A bill (No. 463) for the relief of Ambrose Morrison, of Nashville, Tennessee. [Objected to by five members.]

AMZI L. BURNES.

A bill (H. R. No. 529) for the relief of Amzi L. Burnes. [Objected to by five members.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the report will be read in that case.

The CHAIRMAN. The report is not at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HALE. I wish to state that this is a bill for the relief of a poor man who had $550 in United States Treasury notes. The proof is very satisfactory that they were burnt up when his house was burnt, together with all he had. If that does not give him a claim to have those notes replaced by a just Government, I do not know what would.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If discussion is in order, I will say that there was proof equally positive that certain bonds were burnt up on the Golden Gate, and yet those bonds afterward turned up in the Department here.

Mr. HALE. These bonds never have turned up and never will. I hold in my hand some proofs in the case, if the gentleman will hear them read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This is not only a matter of fact, but a matter of principle. I am opposed to this Government paying for everything which is burnt.

Mr. HALE. We have never objected to paying such claims where the proof was clear that the notes had been destroyed. No honest man and no honest Government would refuse to pay a claim of this kind. The proof is clear that these notes were burnt, when this man's house was burnt, with all his property.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is discussion in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. The bill is objected to by five members.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and no quorum voting the Chairman ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and HALE.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 28, noes 69.

So the committee refused to rise.

EGBERT A. THOMPSON.

A bill (H. R. No. 531) for the relief of Egbert A. Thompson. [Objected to by five members.]

GARRETT R. BARRY.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 46) for the relief of Garrett R. Barry, a paymaster in the United States Navy. [Objected to by five members.]

LOUISVILLE AND BARDSTOWN TURNPIKE.

A bill (H. R. No. 544) for the relief of the Louisville and Bardstown Turnpike Company. [Objected to by five members.]

COLONEL H. C. DE AHNA.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 105) to provide for payment of the claim of Colonel H. C. De Ahna. [Objected to by five members.]

JEAN M. LANDER.

A bill (H. R. No. 547) for the relief of Jean M. Lander, widow of F. W. Lander, deceased.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of War to audit and settle the account of Brigadier General F. W. Lander, deceased, for services rendered and expenses incurred by him in making the reconnaissance of a railroad from Puget sound to the Mississippi river, in 1854; and to pay the sum found to be justly due him to Jean M. Lander, his widow, provided the same shall not exceed $4,750, and shall be in full consideration for such services and expenses.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

WOODWARD AND CHORPENNING.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) for the relief of Elizabeth Woodward and George Chorpenning. [Objected to by five members.]

T. T. GARRARD, AND OTHERS.

A bill (H. R. No. 563) for the relief of T. T. Garrard, and others. [Objected to by five members.]

JETHRO BONNEY.

A bill (H. R. No. 571) for the relief of Jethro Bonney.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Jethro Bonney $400, in full for damages sustained by him by reason of the destruction of his store by the Army of the United States, at the invasion of Plattsburg, during the war of 1812.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are still a few other bills on the Calendar. I hope they will be first disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. J. C. ALLEN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had had the Private Calendar under consideration, and had directed him to report back several bills to the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Hickey, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed a resolution for the appointment of a committee, consisting of three members, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and of notifying the persons chosen of their election; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate had appointed Mr. TRUMBULL, Mr. CONNESS, and Mr. WRIGHT as the said committee on the part of the Senate.

ALEXANDER F. PRATT.

A bill (H. R. No. 574) for the relief of Alexander F. Pratt, reported without amendment from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, was engrossed, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. WILSON, (at four o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 28, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of June 17, 1864, a copy of the record of the proceedings and findings of a naval general court-martial in the case of C. W. Scofield, a naval contractor; which was ordered to lie on the table.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. No. 714) supplemental to the act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims," &c., passed July 4, 1864;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 150) to refer the claim of Selmar Seibert back to the Court of Claims;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 151) to refer the claim of George Ashley, administrator de bonis non of Samuel Holgate, deceased, back to the Court of Claims; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 152) to refer the claim of Danford Mott back to the Court of Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of members of the Senate of the State of Ohio, praying that the rank and pay of the hospital stewards of the United States Army may be increased to that of brevet second lieutenant of artillery, to take rank next after the graduates of the West Point Military Academy; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. ANTHONY presented a memorial of the officers of the seventh and fourth regiments of Rhode Island volunteer infantry, now serving before Petersburg, asking for an increase of pay corresponding with the price of all the necessities of life; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented a petition of citizens of Rhode Island, praying that a fog signal capable of being heard two or three miles from the shore be placed at Nayatt Point; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOWE. I ask leave to present the petition of E. R. Wadsworth and sundry other citizens of Wisconsin, for the enactment of a general bankrupt law. As I understand that subject has been reported upon by the Committee on the Judiciary, I move that the petition lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States recognizing the Christian religion; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and the treatment of freedmen.

Mr. CONNESS. I present the petition of four hundred and twenty-five citizens of Petaluma, Sonoma county, California, praying that Congress may pass an act authorizing the city of Petaluma to enter at the proper land office all the lands within the corporate limits of that city which may be upon the lands of the United States recognizing the present official plat of that city. I also present a map to accompany the petition; and I desire also to introduce a bill in accordance with the request of the petition. I move that the petition with the map be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I will ask my colleague whether that same subject is not now before the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no knowledge that it is. This is a memorial of citizens of that city; and I have no knowledge that the same question is before Congress.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I suggest whether the subject had not better all be before the same committee.

Mr. CONNESS. I prefer to have it go where similar questions are now, to the Committee on Public Lands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 416) to grant the right of preemption to the trustees of the city of Petaluma, Sonoma county, California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. NESMITH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 417) for the relief of Jean M. Lander, widow of F. W. Lander, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SPRAGUE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 418) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress," approved August 16, 1856; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

DELAWARE VOLUNTEERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further morning business, the following resolution is before the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to answer a resolution of the Senate, of December 22, 1864, in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate whether volunteers for thirty days and for one hundred days were called for by order of his Department at any time preceding the last two drafts in the State of Delaware, from that State, and, if so, for what purpose, and under what authority of law; whether such volunteers were promised, as an inducement to volunteer, exemption from said drafts; whether said volunteers were exempted from said drafts when they volunteered; whether they were kept within the limits of said State; and whether they were promised, as a further inducement to volunteer, that they should not be sent without the limits of said State, or that they should not be employed in active service in the field."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask that that lie on the table for the present. I have not seen the report of the Secretary of War, in answer to the original resolution, yet. It was not printed yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

BENJAMIN VREELAND.

Mr. ANTHONY. If it is in order, I move that the Senate take up the bill for the relief of Surgeon Vreeland, which was laid over the other day at the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] who was not aware of the general law on the subject, which I have since found.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 412) for the relief of Benjamin Vreeland, surgeon in the Navy of the United States.

Mr. MORRILL. It seems to me that the allowance made by this bill is the merest gratuity in the world. It is not for any service rendered, as I understand.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is for services rendered. I explained the case when the bill was up the other day, but perhaps the Senator does not remember. This officer was sent to sea, and was at sea at the time when he was entitled to be examined for his promotion, and when all the other officers of his rank and of the same date were examined. He could not be examined of course until he returned from sea. Then he was examined and passed; and on file with the papers is a certificate of the board that he would have passed at the time when he was entitled to his examination if he could have had it, but he could not have it because he was absent on service. Now he asks for the pay of the advanced grade from the time when he was entitled to his examination until the time when he passed it. A general law has since been passed covering all such cases; I will read it; it is the sixteenth section of the act of July 17, 1862:

"And be it further enacted, That whenever any officer of the Navy, of a class subject by law or regulation to examination before promotion to a higher grade, shall have been absent on duty at the time when he should have been examined, and shall have been found qualified at a subsequent examination, the increased rate of pay to which he may be entitled shall be allowed to him from the date when he would have received it had he been found qualified at the time when his examination should have taken place."

The trouble is that this law is not retroactive. This case occurred before the law was passed. There have been repeated instances of this kind, and I believe the allowance has been made in every case. The justice of it is very apparent. Otherwise the officers who go abroad upon distant service would be placed under a positive disability compared with those who get leave of absence and remain at home.

Mr. MORRILL. Still I believe it is strictly what I supposed it to be, a gratuity. This officer got the pay of his rank; there is no doubt about it; but being on foreign service he could not be examined for promotion to a superior rank at a particular time, and therefore did not get the pay of that rank from that time, but only from the time he was actually examined. That was not his fault, nor the fault of the Government; it was simply the misfortune of the officer. It seems to me this bill is establishing a very bad precedent. If the absence was for a year or any number of years the same principle would apply.

Mr. ANTHONY. The rule does apply; it is a law; and the only reason why this case comes here is that the law was not made retroactive. Every other officer has this privilege, or this gratuity, as the Senator calls it. I do not think it is a gratuity, but it is a strict provision of law ever since 1862, and previous to that time these applications were constantly made by officers, and were always granted by Congress. I do not think there ought to be an exception made in the case of this man.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely call the attention of the Senate to the principle involved.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MADISON PAPERS.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Committee on the Library have directed me to report a joint resolution in relation to the publication of the papers of James Madison, and I wish to have the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the joint resolution at the present time. I will state the situation of the case. Congress passed an act directing the Committee on the Library to publish the correspondence of James Madison, and appropriated, I think, $8,000 for the purpose. They were to publish one thousand copies, which would be four thousand volumes, as the work is to be in four volumes. The committee entered into a contract under the law. In the first place they employed Mr. Rives, of Virginia, to make the compilation, and the papers which had been purchased of Mrs. Madison some years before were put into the hands of Mr. Rives to make that compilation. He did make the compilation and returned the copy here, and was paid for his work out of that appropriation $3,000. After the copy was furnished by Mr. Rives, a contract was entered into with Mr. Wendell to make the publication, and Mr. Fendall, of this city, was appointed to prepare the index for the work and to supervise the proof-sheets. The thing went on; but the change of circumstances, the increase of prices, &c., disturbed it, so that at last Mr. Wendell failed altogether; he could not perform the work, and he gave up the contract. We find that we cannot get the work published to the amount of one thousand copies or four thousand volumes for the money in hand; but we are of opinion that five hundred copies, two thousand volumes, will be sufficient to enable Congress to make all the distribution and exchanges that have been made of the works of Mr. Hamilton, and we can probably make a contract securing the publication of that number of copies for the money already on hand at the present rate of materials and labor. The committee are of opinion that it is advisable to finish it, and to receive the five hundred copies instead of one thousand as originally provided by law. This resolution is to carry that idea into effect by authorizing the committee to contract for five hundred copies instead of one thousand.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 105) respecting the publication of the papers of James Madison was read three times, and passed.

QUOTAS OF THE STATES.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will continue calling up the resolutions on the table in their order. The next is the resolution submitted by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RIDDLE] calling for the number of soldiers and sailors furnished by the loyal States under the proclamation of the President for five hundred thousand men, dated July 16, 1864. To this resolution the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia reported an amendment, which will be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert: That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate what number of soldiers and sailors, stating each separately, the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia have furnished the Army and Navy under all the calls heretofore made, setting forth the number demanded and the number furnished under each call.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. When the resolution was last before the Senate the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] proposed to amend the amendment by adding to it the words "and the time for which the same were enlisted."

The amendment to the amendment was adopted, and the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

CONDUCT OF GENERAL PAINE AT PADUCAH.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The next resolution is one offered by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL,] requesting the President of the United States to cause Brigadier General E. A. Paine to be arraigned and tried for his conduct while in command at Paducah, Kentucky.

MR. POWELL. I do not wish that resolution to be acted upon until we receive a response to the resolution which the Senate has passed asking for the report of the commission appointed to investigate the conduct of General Paine. I believe that the Secretary of War has not yet responded to that resolution. I move, therefore, that this resolution lie on the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON CORRUPTIONS.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The next resolution in order is a resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows: Resolved, That the special rule of the Senate, No. 34, be amended by adding these words: "A committee for the investigation of the corruptions of the Government in all its Departments and offices, to consist of five members."

MR. DAVIS. I will say but a word in relation to this resolution. If the rule which it proposes should be adopted, and the proper men should be appointed from session to session to serve on that committee, and they would faithfully and diligently discharge their duties, there is no committee organized by the Senate that, in my opinion, would render anything like the amount of service to the Government and country that such a committee would. I do not propose to say anything more but merely to ask for the yeas and nays on the question of adopting the resolution.

MR. SHERMAN. Is the resolution now before the Senate?

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It is, and the question is on its adoption.

MR. SHERMAN. If such a resolution was offered in the House of Representatives, upon charges made in that body against any officer of the Government, I would always vote for a special or even for a general committee of investigation; but it seems to me that it is a departure from the usage and theory and organization of the Senate to examine into any such matters. The House of Representatives are the proper custodians of the morals of the people and of the duties of public officers. They are the examining tribunal, made so by the Constitution. They impeach; we try; in that respect this is a judicial tribunal. It seems to me we ought not to enter into the investigation of matters that may lead to an impeachment. The whole theory of our Government is against the proposition of the honorable Senator from Kentucky. All accusations made against officers should be made in the House of Representatives; and when they assume due form and solemnity in the nature of charges, they may be sent to us for trial; but we ought not here to institute preliminary examinations which may lead to an impeachment. If we do, the result of the examinations would have to go to the House of Representatives.

It seems to me, therefore, that this is not the body to organize such a committee, even if one is desirable; but I doubt very much whether one ought to be formed in either House of a permanent, standing character. When accusations are made against any of the Government officers the House is always ready to engage in the examination, and no party dare refuse, upon the proper showing, to engage in the examination of charges of fraud and corruption. I am sure that the present controlling party in this country would not dare to refuse to examine into a charge made against any officer of the Government upon sufficient showing and grounds. The House might refuse such an examination when the charge was too general and undefined; but when a distinct charge of corruption or fraud is made against any officer of the Government, the House of Representatives has always been willing, under all Administrations, to examine into that charge. It seems to me that the Senate is not the tribunal to institute these examinations, and I should be very sorry indeed to see a rule adopted which would place among our standing committees a committee to examine into frauds and corruptions, when we might be compelled judicially to sit upon those very matters when presented by the House of Representatives in a constitutional form.

MR. HALE. I doubt whether anything will come of this. I have known something about these investigations. I think the honorable Senator from Ohio who has just addressed the Chair could give some information on the subject of how much weight and effect are given to the results which committees of investigation come to. I think he in the House of Representatives was at the head of a committee that investigated some naval contracts, and I think they found some very gross evidences of fraud, and they got a resolution of censure through the House, and there the matter ended.

There was a committee appointed by the Senate at the last session to investigate matters connected with naval supplies. The committee attended to that duty very laboriously, and they laid some results before the Senate and before the country which I think were most conclusive as to the existence of gross fraud. Well, sir, do you know what use the thing was? One of the material witnesses in that case, one of the most respectable men in Boston, who testified, and testified very fully before that committee, pretty soon after he went home was seized, his store seized, his papers seized, his wife's papers seized, and he was sent to a military fort and ordered not to be released under a bail of $500,000, and was ordered to Philadelphia for trial. That was a little too strong even for the city of Boston, considering that to render the thing more notorious the arrest was made on the 17th of June.

MR. DAVIS. I will ask the honorable Senator if the offense for which that gentleman was seized and imprisoned was merely that of giving in his testimony and his exposure of those frauds?

MR. HALE. That is my opinion, but it was not the assigned cause. They ordered him, as I have said, to be confined in Fort Warren, and not to be released under $500,000 bail, and he was ordered to Philadelphia for trial. This was a little too much for the loyal city of Boston, and it created such indignation there that a delegation of citizens of Massachusetts—I think the honorable Senator on my left [Mr. SUMNER] was one of them—represented this thing to the President, and the President countermanded the order for carrying a citizen of Massachusetts from Boston to Philadelphia for trial. The parties that had directed the bail to be put at $500,000 began to be a little alarmed, and they consented to take off $480,000 of the sum and liberate him on a bail of $20,000, which was done.

But that was not all. It was not the witnesses only that were to be punished. They sent a roving commission to Boston and to Portsmouth, New Hampshire, to see not only if they could find something against the witnesses, but against the unfortunate gentleman who stood at the head of that committee, and had been instrumental in exposing these frauds. I will read to you the written instructions that this commission came to Portsmouth with, to show you who take care of these things:

"Some time in 1861 or spring of 1862 a lot of ship timber was prepared for Captain Macy; but he gave up the building of ships, and this timber was offered to the Navy Department at Portsmouth at fourteen dollars per ton, and refused, (who were the parties offering it?) and in a short time afterward the timber was put in the yard at twenty-eight dollars per ton, (who put it in?) and did JOHN P. HALE have anything to do with it directly or indirectly?"

"Who is James Tarlton? He says HALE managed the affair."

"Do you know anything where HALE has been interested?"

Those were the instructions with which the gentleman who is said to be the actual Secretary of the Navy sent a roving commission to Charleston.

MR. JOHNSON. I will inquire of the honorable member, did those instructions come from the Navy Department?

MR. HALE. I cannot say who wrote them, or in whose handwriting they are, but those were the instructions that were furnished to the commission that went to the Portsmouth navy-yard to investigate the frauds of that transaction, or such frauds as they could find.

MR. JOHNSON. You do not know who furnished this to the commission?

MR. HALE. No; but you know I am a Yankee, and I have the privilege of guessing.

MR. DAVIS. Whom do you guess?

MR. HALE. I guess it was the man who is called the actual Secretary of the Navy, and I have no doubt about it.

MR. POWELL. Give us the name.

MR. HALE. Oh, no; I prefer to be a little Fox-y on that and keep dark. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I think before the Senate or Congress institute any more investigations into frauds, they should take some measure to vindicate their own authority and protect their own witnesses who testify before them. This, which was furnished to me in writing as one of the written instructions to this committee that came to Portsmouth, is only one of a great many similar insinuations with which they were charged to investigate the conduct of this HALE, both at Charleston and at Portsmouth; and the reason that it is not duly proved is that the authors of it could not find any witnesses so base as themselves. They could fabricate, but they could not get witnesses to sustain it; and that is the whole of it.

I think this matter of investigation has got to be a farce. If you will read the report of that committee you will see evidence of the most conclusive character of fraud, not upon the Navy Department, but in it. What did they do? What did the Administration do when they found fraud in that Department? Did they investigate it? Not at all; but they sent this commission roving over the country to see if they could not find something else.

The papers have been filled lately with revelations of tremendous frauds perpetrated at the navy-yard at Philadelphia. It is said that Philadelphia lawyers are very keen and acute, and it has been a by-word that "a man is as keen as a Philadelphia lawyer," or "it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to do that." But, sir, smart as the Philadelphia lawyers were, keen as they were, and numerous as they were, there was not one of them keen enough for the purposes of this inquiry, and they sent to New Hampshire and imported a lawyer from New Hampshire to Philadelphia, to investigate the frauds that were practiced in the Philadelphia navy-yard upon the Navy Department. I think that hereafter the keenness of the Philadelphia lawyers will be at a discount if that was an actual necessity.

MR. PRESIDENT. I am tired to death with these investigations. I have not failed since I have been a member of this body to denounce fraud wherever I have seen it. We had plenty of specimens of it under Democratic Administrations, and we pointed them out. There was a war made upon Paraguay. We fitted out a naval expedition and sent it there, and at the month of our cannon we forced a treaty out of Paraguay to pay our own citizens what Paraguay owed them. We got a commission. We got a citizen of the United States appointed arbitrator under that commission; and what did he find? He found that we were actually indebted to Paraguay, and not a dollar was due to us. But still, sir, the expedition did just exactly what it was intended to do. A great naval expedition was gotten up at the public expense, and made a raid upon the Treasury, and succeeded. Then there was a war made upon Utah; and after immense sums had been spent and everything had been done, so far as preying upon the Treasury was concerned, they found that they had carried the war far enough; and I believe there was not a soldier went to Utah.

Mr. CONNESS. Oh, yes, they did.

Mr. HALE. Did they do anything?

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir.

Mr. HALE. My friend says they went as far as Utah, but they did nothing. That Administration had got to be corrupt.

When this Administration came into power I had hoped—I confess I was green enough to believe—that I was acting with a party who were now in power that were ready to put their hand upon these frauds and upon the perpetrators of them. I have pointed them out again and again; and the result is, that instead of punishing the fraudulent perpetrators of these wrongs, they have turned round and constituted themselves guardians of the Senate, and sent commissioners over the country to see if there was not something that some Senator had done that it was incumbent upon them to rectify and punish; and Senators now act here, whenever they touch any fraud, at the peril of calling upon their heads the vengeance of those who perpetrate it.

Mr. President, upon leaving the Senate, I will say to my friends, that if there is one thing to which we are pledged it is honesty, or at least an approximation to it. There is no party that can stand before the country, before history, and before posterity, that habitually disregards it. Engaged as we are in the most momentous struggle that the history of the world has ever witnessed, and with the consequences depending upon the manner in which this great problem is to be solved, it becomes us, as a nation whose confidence is in the God of justice, that we do not separate Him from the support of our cause. It is an old and true and trite observation, applicable to national as well as individual affairs, that "honesty is the best policy."

I respect the purpose of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, but do not talk to me about any more committees, either standing or special, to investigate frauds in any Department of this Government until you have begun to mark with your censure at least some of those that have already been pointed out. There is a policy which says—and I regret it, but I have met it; I have met it on this floor and I have met it elsewhere—that when delinquencies are perpetrated, especially if an election is about pending, and any of our own friends have been guilty or suspected, that we should tread cautiously and lightly and delicately upon it, lest in punishing some of the guilty perpetrators we do injury to the great cause we have at heart and with which they are connected. Mr. President, such a policy as that is an encouragement to speculators and plunderers and thieves to unite themselves with the popular party, with the majority who control the legislative and executive departments; it is an invitation to them to join that party, because they say, "If we do it we may then steal ad libitum, and no reckoning will be made with us, no punishment will be visited upon us, lest it may injure the party." That policy is subversive of the highest dictates of morality and the clearest demands of patriotism.

Sir, this country can never come out of this great struggle, as I trust it will, as I hope it will, as I believe it will—it can never come out of it triumphantly until we cut loose from frauds and corruptions of every kind and make ourselves clean before the nation and before God. If we hesitate, if we pause in such a work, it seems to me that we are unworthy of the position that we occupy and of the duty which the country requires of us. While you have reports upon reports made by committees of this body and of the House of Representatives, and the evidence is published and there is an end of it, do not talk to me, in Heaven's name, about any more committees of investigation, special or general, but—

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise to ask the Senator from New Hampshire what was the result of the trial of the person who testified to whom he has alluded?

Mr. HALL. It is not promulgated yet.

Mr. JOHNSON. Has he been tried?
Mr. WILSON. He has been tried, and the verdict is in the hands of the Government, but it is not promulgated yet.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, I desire to say right here what I would not have said otherwise. I suppose it is too late at this time to undertake to correct any errors of legislation that we have committed in regard to the authority we have conferred upon these courts-martial, naval and military; but I want to call your attention to a few facts. Commodore Wilkes—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor in the chair.) The Senator from New Hampshire will suspend his remarks. Further debate on this question at this time is arrested by the special order, the morning hour having expired, that special order being the joint resolution in respect to retaliation.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President:

A bill (S. No. 363) to amend the charter of the Washington Gas-Light Company;

A bill (H. R. No. 94) for the relief of Isaac R. Diller;

A bill (H. R. No. 394) for the relief of Mary Scales Accordi;

RETALIATION ON REBEL PRISONERS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 97) advising retaliation for the cruel treatment of prisoners by the insurgents, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. Wilson to recommit the resolution, together with all the amendments and proposed amendments, to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I probably would not trouble the Senate at this time with any remarks on this subject beyond those submitted by me at the beginning of the discussion, had it not been for what seemed to me to be a very strange misapprehension of my meaning. Although I do not deem what may be thought of what I have said here of much consequence, yet perhaps there is nothing amiss in my attempting to set myself right; and in doing this I propose to submit a few remarks upon the general question.

War, Mr. President, is in itself in its very nature retaliatory. No just war can commence by an organized community except for the punishment of injuries received or insults offered by another organized community or civil power. If the party assailed should submit to the infliction of this punishment there would be no war; but if resistance is made, a conflict of arms ensues and war is produced. A repetition of these attempts to punish, on the one hand, and resistance or counter assaults, protracts the war. Each belligerent act is, therefore, in a certain sense, retaliatory. This is true of individual conflicts as well as national struggles. Neither can continue unless blows are given as well as received. To avoid unnecessary suffering in civilized countries certain rules are observed by Governments as well as by gentlemen, for the protection of non-combatants and private property. Whatever injury may be inflicted by a belligerent on the person or property of the private citizens of the enemy's country, or on individual combatants, not necessary for the achievement of the object of the contest is unjustifiable cruelty, and hence is said to be in violation of the rules of civilized warfare, and should be scrupulously avoided. Such acts of wantonness should be avoided both because they are useless and cruel and on account of the demoralizing effect their toleration must produce on the nation itself which practices or permits them. But if during the existence of war either belligerent departs from the ordinary rules observed by civilized nations, the other party has no alternative but to make a departure also so far forth as may be necessary to compel the delinquent to observe them. This is called the law of retaliation.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] read some authorities to show that when this punishment is inflicted in retaliation for a departure from the rules of civilized warfare, it ought to be administered in all cases upon the very individuals that made the departure.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator permit me to explain?

Mr. HARLAN. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I said that where the law of retaliation was inflicted so as to produce death, the two authorities which I read laid down the principle that it could only be inflicted on those who were personally guilty of the offenses to which the retaliation was to be applied. But I stated that I carried the law of retaliation further than those two authorities, and that under certain circumstances persons not personally guilty should be punished by death, but not by starvation.

Mr. HARLAN. Then I stand corrected. It seems that the honorable Senator read from authors that inculcated this doctrine, as I stated, but that he disagreed with them, I suppose. It is, however, the duty of the belligerent to seize the very individuals that perpetrate the wrong and inflict the retaliatory punishment on the identical parties perpetrating the outrages if it can obtain possession of their persons. If they cannot do so, then it is the duty of the belligerent aggrieved to bring the facts in the case to the attention of the authorities controlling the opposing forces, and demand redress, or the surrender of the culprits for punishment by the injured party. If, however, this is refused, there is no alternative but to resort to what is styled, I believe, technically the lex talionis; not on account of a feeling of revenge, not in wantonness of spirit, not for the purpose of inflicting punishment on innocent individuals per se, but for the purpose of deterring the opposing belligerent Power from a continuance of the wrongs.

This is the law of nations as well as the law of common sense, which no Senator can, as it is supposed, successfully refute either by the citation of standard authorities, or by any correct principles of reasoning. It is the right of the belligerent to correct such wrongs by the use of such punishment as may be necessary to deter the offender from continuing the wrongful practice; and just so far forth a belligerent has a right to depart from what would otherwise be the rules controlling civilized nations in carrying on a war. They have no other alternative. No other mode of redress is within their reach.

This is not only in accordance with the doctrines laid down by standard publicists on this subject, and all correct reasoning, but it is in strict accordance with the practice of civilized nations, our own nation included. It was practiced during the revolutionary struggle, during the war of 1812, and we have resorted to the infliction of retaliatory punishment again and again during the continuance of the existing struggle. Our Government has repeatedly inflicted the punishment of death on rebels, personally innocent of any offense, in retaliation for the murder of Union soldiers by the rebels. Their prisoners have also for the same reason occasionally been subjected to great peril that would otherwise have been in violation of the rules which control civilized nations in the conduct of a war. This was done at Charleston, at Richmond, at Dutch Gap, and perhaps almost every day on our lines of communication to the front. For the purpose of deterring guerrillas from firing into our trains and our transports, our authorities have been compelled to put on board eminent rebel citizens, or rebel prisoners, thus compelling them to share the danger to which our troops were cruelly exposed by these assassin-like enemies while on their way to the front. It is admitted that such acts of retaliation are justifiable and in strict conformity with the rules of war as practiced by the most civilized nations. And as practiced by our authorities this retaliation has proved effective.

This brings me to the case before the Senate.

It is said by the Committee on Military Affairs, in the preamble to the resolution now pending, that it has come to the knowledge of Congress that the rebel authorities have deliberately departed from the usages of civilized nations in the treatment of prisoners of war now in their hands, not in isolated cases which might be explained to have occurred on account of the bad character of officers here and there temporarily in charge of our prisoners, but that it has been ascertained to be the rule and not an exception. The rebels seem to have deliberately adopted and persist in practicing the most shameful treatment of these victims of their barbarity from day to day and from month to month. It doubtless has been done for a purpose; as diplomatists would say, for reasons of state, to compel the Government to agree to their terms in the exchange of prisoners. This reminds me of what seemed to me to be a strange misapprehension of my opinions on the subject of the propriety of exchanges by Senators who have preceded me in this discussion. They have addressed me in this discussion as an opponent of the policy. Sir, have I ever opposed it? Have I ever thrown impediments in the way of a just rule for the mutual exchange of prisoners of war?

Why, sir, before a single prisoner had been exchanged, after the commencement of this war, and, so far as I know before any effort had been made to secure the adoption of a policy for the exchange of prisoners, I, at my desk here, drew up a paper requesting the President of the United States to adopt some just means to secure the exchange of Union troops held as prisoners of war, presented it to every Senator occupying a seat on this floor for his signature, and then submitted it to the President with such reasons as occurred to me at the time in favor of the policy. Up to that time no exchanges had been made. I do not know that this paper had any influence on the mind of the Executive in the adoption of the cartel soon afterward agreed to. I do not cite it for the purpose of making such an impression, but for my personal vindication. I was at least orthodox in practice, and in action took the lead of the very Senators who have so strangely forgotten our early relative position on this subject.

Soon after this a cartel for the exchange of prisoners was adopted, and exchanges were made from time to time, as deliveries were practical, until the rebel authorities themselves refused to observe it. A perusal of the correspondence of the commissioners of exchange, published in Senate Executive Document No. 17, will satisfy any Senator that the exchanges were suspended under this cartel by the action of the rebel authorities themselves. This suspension was not caused by any subordinate of the so-called rebel government; it was the deliberate act of their highest officials. The chief of the rebel government required it by proclamation, the congress of the so-called confederate government demanded it by a formal act of legislation. By these solemn acts of their highest officials it was provided that colored Union troops, when captured, should be sold into slavery, and that their officers should not be treated as prisoners of war, but should be delivered over to the civil authorities of the several States to be punished as felons. I think, perhaps, it will not be amiss to read a few brief extracts on this subject from this correspondence. On page 2 of the document cited, I find, in a letter from "William H. Ludlow, lieutenant colonel, and agent for exchange of prisoners," to Major General Hitchcock, the following:

"GENERAL: I have the honor to inclose you a copy of the Richmond Enquirer, containing Jeff. Davis's message. His determination, avowed in most insolent terms, to deliver to the several State authorities all commissioned officers of the United States that may hereafter be captured, will, I think, be persevered in."

Then follows the passage from the document cited in the message:

"I confine myself to informing you that I shall, unless in your wisdom you deem some other course more expedient, deliver to the several State authorities all commissioned officers of the United States that may hereafter be captured by our forces in any of the States embraced in the proclamation, that they may be dealt with in accordance with the laws of those States providing for the punishment of criminals engaged in exciting servile insurrection."

I will read now from a letter of Robert Ould, addressed to Lieutenant Colonel Ludlow, (commissioner, &c.,) in which he says:

"In your communication of the 14th instant you desire to know whether the Federal commissioned officers now prisoners will be released. I have already furnished you with an official copy of the proclamation of President Davis, dated December 23, 1862. In conformity therewith officers will not be released on parole."

But again, I read from another letter, signed "William H. Ludlow," and addressed to "Hon. Robert Ould, agent for the exchange of prisoners," dated "Fort Monroe, June 14, 1863," in which he says:

"Sections four, five, six, and seven of this act"—

The act to which I have just referred, of the confederate congress—

"propose a gross and inexcusable breach of the cartel, both in letter and spirit. Upon reference to the cartel, you will find no mention whatever of what was to be the color of prisoners of war. It was unnecessary to make any such mention, for, before the establishment of this cartel, and before one single negro or mulatto was mustered into the United States service, you had them organized in arms in Louisiana. You had Indians and half-breed negroes and Indians organized in arms under Albert Pike, in Arkansas. Subsequently negroes were captured on the battle-field at Antietam, and delivered as prisoners of war at Aiken's Landing to the confederate authorities and receipted for and counted in exchange. And more recently the confederate legislature of Tennessee have passed an act forcing into their military service (I quote literally) all male free persons of color between the ages of fifteen and fifty, or such number as may be necessary, who may be sound in body and capable of actual service; and they further enacted that in the event a sufficient number of free persons of color to meet the wants of the State shall not tender their services, then the Governor is empowered through the sheriffs of different counties to impress such persons until the required number is obtained."

"But it is needless to argue the question. You have not a foot of ground to stand upon in making the proposed discrimination among our captured officers and men. I protest against it as a violation of the cartel, of the laws and usages of war, and of your own practices under them."

Then, again, to show that they themselves were responsible for a failure to carry out the exchange of prisoners under the cartel, I will read from a letter of William H. Ludlow, lieutenant colonel, and agent for the exchange of prisoners, addressed to Robert Ould, dated July 22, 1863:

"You will recollect that since the proclamation of Hon. Jefferson Davis of December last, and more especially since the passage of the act of the confederate congress in reference to our captured officers, both of which were in violation of the cartel, and have caused in the one case a temporary and in the other a continued suspension of exchange of officers, all such exchanges have been subjects of special agreement between us."

"To avoid the complications and annoyances of these special agreements, I have again and again urged you to a return to the cartel, but, up to the present moment, in vain. On the contrary, you retain in close confinement large numbers of our officers, for whom I have made a demand and tendered equivalents."

"Until you consent to return to the terms prescribed by the cartel for exchange of officers, I shall not consent to any exchange of them except by special agreements."

But again, I read from a letter signed "Benjamin F. Butler, major general commanding, and commissioner of exchange," dated, "Fortress Monroe, Virginia, January 12, 1864," in which he says:

"This Government claims and exercises the power of appointing its own agents to represent its interests, irrespective of any supposed sanction by the confederate authorities."

"No right of declaration of outlawry by those authorities of any officer or soldier of the United States can be admitted, or for a moment regarded, by the Government of the United States, as it certainly will not be by the persons upon whom such intimidation is attempted."

"I am instructed"—

And to this I ask the attention of every Senator—

"I am instructed to renew the offer, leaving all other questions in abeyance, to exchange man for man and officer for officer of equal rank actually held in custody by either party, until all prisoners of war so held are thus exchanged. I take leave to express the hope, from humane considerations to those confined as prisoners of war on either side, that this offer will be accepted."

In the face of this official record, what foundation exists for imputing blame to the Administration for a partial failure to secure the exchange of all the prisoners of war held by the rebels, when this has not at any time been refused, and on the other hand has been constantly urged and insisted on by our authorities? Here is a standing offer to exchange man for man, and officer for officer, of equal rank according to the cartel. This offer the rebels persistently decline. This refusal rendered it necessary to resort to special exchanges. Then what becomes of the charge of inhumanity? It is inhuman, we are told, not to exchange these prisoners. Why are they not exchanged? Because the rebel authorities refuse to carry out the cartel according to its terms and spirit, which provided for the exchange of man for man and officer for officer of equal rank, and where those of the same rank could not be secured, then the exchange of equivalents, and which provides that the excess found on either side should be paroled. This is now, according to the record before us, the standing offer of this Government. Why is it not accepted? Because the rebels persist theoretically in treating as felons officers commanding colored troops. For the purpose of coercing this Government to adopt their theories and to practically approve of their outlawry of our officers, they have, as I believe, deliberately adopted and practiced cruelty to our prisoners in their hands.

It may not be amiss to observe here that while exchanges under the cartel were in progress the rebel authorities deliberately violated their plighted faith over and over again by immediately putting into their service paroled prisoners, before their exchange; that tens of thousands of paroled prisoners captured by Grant's army at Vicksburg were again met by our troops with arms in their hands on other battle-fields, where it became necessary to recapture them, or be destroyed or be captured by them.

They also, as it is known, I suppose, to every Senator, objected to the commissioner appointed by the Federal Government. They had outlawed him. He had directed some man in New Orleans to be hung for pulling down the flag of his country after the city had surrendered. They had outlawed him and declared they would hold no further communication with this Government through him; that is, they claimed the right of dictating to this Government who should command its armies, who should be assigned to the performance of this or that military service, and then to dictate what should be the color of the skin of the men mustered into the armies of the United States. Unless we would permit them to control the composition and command of our armies they would coerce us into these measures by wanton and cruel treatment of our prisoners in their hands.

If we decline to do this, then they will put our prisoners of war on insufficient food, will expose them to the inclemency of the weather, without shelter or raiment! Here is a departure on their part from the usages of civilized nations which, it seems to me, lays a just foundation for such a departure on our part as will deter them from its continuance. They are systematically reducing our prisoners in point of physical vigor below the standard of efficiency as soldiers. It seems to me, without laying ourselves liable to the charge of cruelty, we would have the right to put their troops in our hands as prisoners of war on a like diet, and give them notice that this had been done in retaliation for the cruel treatment they are inflicting on prisoners of war held by them, and that this diet will be changed the very moment they abandon this departure from the rules of civilized warfare on their part.

But I am told that this is shocking to humanity, that it is very cruel and unchristian. If it be cruel, but necessary to compel them to observe the rules of civilized nations, is it not just; as just as shooting or exposing to the rake of shot and shell or of exposure to guerrilla bullet on railroad trains, steamers, and transports, all of which you have been practicing? Is it any more cruel to put rebels on bread and water to compel the abandonment of cruelty by them than it is to take the life of the individual for the same purpose? But if severe, the adoption of the policy will be indirectly their own act; it will be indirectly the act of the confederate authorities; its continuation, in that case, is in their hands; when they release their grasp of the throat of the victim they hold that very moment the policy will be changed in relation to the prisoners held by us and suffering retaliatory punishment.

But it is said that this would involve the right to scalp, to mutilate, to sell into slavery. I see no connection between the premises and the conclusion. The punishment inflicted may be hard, it may be severe, it may be terrible, for the object of the punishment is to terrify the belligerent party who has himself departed from the rules of civilized warfare. The lex talionis is never applied except to deter a belligerent from such departure. The punishment, therefore, may be severe, it may be terrible, but should be human; it should not be accompanied by any unnecessary circumstances of cruelty. If you refuse to resort to this remedy you will place your troops that may by the fortunes of war fall into the hands of the rebels at their mercy.

But it has been suggested by Senators during the progress of this discussion, that they proposed an immediate exchange of prisoners, and would thus avoid the necessity of retaliation. I have just shown that this is impracticable, because the rebels refuse to carry out the cartel or to adopt any other just rule which could be agreed to by our Government without dishonor. If these prisoners have not been thus exchanged, it is not the fault of the Administration, but is the wrongful act of the rebel authorities. Now, how will you coerce them? They persistently retain these prisoners of yours and inflict on them inhuman punishment; they apply to them unchristian treatment. You cannot obtain possession of the persons of the identical parties who perpetrate these wrongs. You therefore have no other alternative but to permit them to waste away your armies by this cruel treatment, or resort to some effective system of retaliation. But, then, if they were to throw no impediments in the way of a fair exchange every Senator knows that it is often impossible, immediately after prisoners have been captured, to secure an exchange; they are frequently, on account of the condition of the contest, retained in custody for weeks and months. If, during this necessary delay in bringing about an exchange of prisoners, cruel and unusual treatment is applied to the prisoners of war in their hands, how will you correct the evil for the time being unless you admit, and, if necessary, resort to, retaliation?

I did state, in the outset of this discussion, that I was of the opinion that this refusal on their part to make exchanges was not disadvantageous to us in a military point of view; I still say so, because I think so. It was not disadvantageous to us, first, because we have had constantly an enormous excess of prisoners. When they have had from thirty to forty thousand of Union troops as captives of war in their hands, we have had a number ranging from eighty to ninety thousand, so that when they refuse to return to the cartel and exchange man for man as far as they have men, and then receive the excess under parole, they damage their own and not the Union cause.

But then, again, if the number of troops held as prisoners of war by each of the belligerent parties was exactly equal, I attempted to show in the brief remarks then submitted, that an exchange, man for man, in the present condition of the contest, would not be advantageous to us, because they are now fighting inside of strongly built works, where one man is equal to three or four fighting on the outside. This is too clear to require elucidation, unless some one will maintain that one is greater than four. My allusion to this condition of the contest was the occasion of the charge made by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] of a departure from humane and Christian sentiments, that induced him and another Senator [Mr. HENDERSON] to favor me with several quotations from the Scriptures. For this kindness they are entitled to and have my thanks. While I have great confidence in the opinions of that Senator when questions of law are involved, especially any question involving a clear understanding of the land laws of the United States, and have an equally high opinion of the legal acumen of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] who also expresses astonishment at my opinions, and would rely on his judgment with great confidence in all legal questions involving the use of clear mental perception, patient research, and inflexible purpose, as well as ability, I say, with great respect to both of these Senators, that if I desired an orthodox exposition of the holy Scriptures, I would not apply to either of them.

It may be that I have an incorrect apprehension on this subject. I think that is possible. But I have attempted to consider this subject, as I have all others during my short career in life, according to the rules of common sense. I suppose these rules are applicable to the holy Scriptures, and necessary for a proper comprehension of them, as well as international law. I know there are such passages as those Senators recited, requiring us to love our neighbors as ourselves, to love our enemies, and to do unto others as we would that they should do unto us. But I submit with great respect for the opinions of others that those passages ought to have a common-sense interpretation; and that seems to me to have been the opinion of the Saviour of the world. I will read a brief passage to illustrate this:

"And, behold, a certain lawyer stood up, and tempted him, saying, Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?"
"He said unto him, What is written in the law? how readest thou?"

"And he answering said, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself."

"And he said unto him, Thou hast answered right: this do, and thou shalt live."

But the lawyer not to be put down, proceeded with his cross-examination, and asked, "Who is my neighbor?" This, it seems, induced the Saviour to narrate the following "little story:"

"And Jesus answering said, A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead."

"And by chance there came down a certain priest that way; and when he saw him, he passed by on the other side."

"And likewise a Levite, when he was at the place, came and looked on him, and passed by on the other side."

"But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was: and when he saw him, he had compassion on him."

"And went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him."

"And on the morrow when he departed, he took out two pence, and gave them to the host, and said unto him, Take care of him; and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again I will repay thee."

"Which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbor unto him that fell among the thieves?"

And the lawyer answered, the Samaritan. And I ask, is not that in accordance with the teachings of common sense? And if a man would not love such a neighbor, would he not deserve the execration of mankind? Well, then, "Thou shalt love thy enemy." How much? What is to be the degree of affection you are to exercise for your enemy? Surely not that degree of affection which you would exercise for such a neighbor as the Samaritan, nor the degree of affection that one would be supposed to feel for a parent, or a child, or a friend; but you are to love him merely as a member of the human family, and avoid inflicting on him acts of cruelty or throwing in his road obstacles to reformation or advancement. In other words, you are to treat him in a common-sense mode, just as his conduct merits.

Now, I am in favor of loving rebels just in the same way, not as I love my neighbor or friend, but as I would be reasonably expected to love an enemy, a party who is using all the power that God and nature have clothed him with to ruin me and mine. I would not "set down aught in malice," and I would reform him if it were in my power. Individually, if he had his hand on my throat, I would retaliate in some humane way until he released his grasp; and so I would treat the rebels, not cruelly, not wantonly, not in a revengeful spirit, but I would inflict on them just that degree and amount of punishment necessary to compel them to observe the rules of civilized warfare. That is in accordance with my understanding of the teachings of the holy Scriptures.

But the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] as is usual with him when he intends to inflict a severe blow—I mean of course in a logical way—complimented me by stating that I had cited the law of nations correctly on this subject, that we were under no obligation according to the practice of international law to exchange prisoners, that it was optional and discretionary on our part; but that we were under the strongest obligation morally to do so, and if we failed to use all the power placed in our hands to bring about such an exchange we should commit a moral offense akin to a great crime. Well, sir, this is more plausible than sound. Let us see if that Senator, with all his legal learning and force of logic, can maintain that position, even if it were logically applicable to any position assumed by me, which I do not admit. That is as a corollary to the reasoning, international law will tolerate a nation in doing that which violates the strongest moral obligation, so strong and overwhelming that to refuse to carry it out amounts to a great crime! Then I submit, if that be true, that the international code is itself in shocking conflict with the moral law.

I know it may be said that while we would not be under obligations to other nations to treat our own subjects humanely, and we would not consequently be held responsible by foreign Powers for any such departure from the moral code, yet I submit the exchange of prisoners must be mutual, and that one belligerent cannot refuse persistently to make these exchanges and leave it possible for the opposing belligerent to secure the return of its subjects, servants, or employees. Then is it true that one belligerent during the continuance of the war may do that in retaliation to its own subjects which is shockingly in conflict with the teachings of morals, which will at the same time render it impossible for the opposing Power to fulfill its obligations to its subjects without violating international obligation? As it seems to me, nothing could be more absurd.

But what is this law of nations that is referred to; this international code that it is said may be in conflict with the teachings of morals? Who enacted it and who enforces it? You do not find it in any statute-book, for there is no legislature on earth, and never has been, that can enact it. And there is no tribunal on earth having power to try a nation for violating it. The international code, therefore, was never enacted and never has been and never can be enforced against an independent Power. Then what is this law of nations, this international code? Nothing but the common understanding of mankind. It is a code of morals applied to communities by the common sense of mankind, just as what is called moral law prescribes the rule of conduct to individuals. No one will maintain that in this country, or any other country where justice prevails, you can enforce a merely moral obligation. You cannot enforce what is called the international code. It has no existence except in the minds of men, in the common consent of mankind. It is therefore a rule of morals as applied to organized communities.

Now, then, the Senator maintains that the code of morals as applied to communities in the organized capacity may be in shocking conflict with morals or the code of morals as applied to individuals; that is, to my comprehension, as absurd as to say that truth is in shocking conflict with truth itself; that justice is in shocking conflict with justice!

The Senator from Indiana charged me with cruelty in suggesting that if an exchange of prisoners could be secured on just terms, and could be carried into effect, man for man, that in a military point of view its wisdom might be doubtful. I attempted to illustrate it in this way: that if a thousand men were in a fort—and the rebels are now in fortified places—it would require four thousand men to capture them, if military science teaches us anything.

I will suppose, then, that the rebels have a thousand Union prisoners, able-bodied men, and we hold a thousand rebel prisoners, able-bodied men. An exchange is agreed to, and the thousand are transhipped from one party to the other. The thousand rebel prisoners sent South go into this fort, and the thousand Union prisoners sent North are added to the army that is investing the stronghold. If the contest was exactly equal in a military point of view before the exchange took place, if it required four thousand men to carry the work and capture the one thousand, if the chances of life and death were then equally balanced, and the chances were about even that the one thousand in the fort would kill the four thousand outside to the chances that the thousand inside would capture or kill the four thousand outside, and you then throw another thousand into the fort and add but one thousand to the investing force, you lack three thousand men to enable you to prosecute the campaign, and must necessarily resort to what the Senator from Indiana, at the last session, was pleased to denominate the horrors of a draft in order to raise those men. I suggested that probably, even on principles of humanity, it might be better in that stage of the contest to allow the thousand prisoners on either side to remain a little longer in captivity until the battle should be over; that probably it would not be more cruel to allow a prisoner to remain in prison a little longer than it would to expose him and three others in front of battle to the missiles of the foe, unless the other Scripture of which I will remind the Senator is not applicable to this case, which says, "It is better for one to suffer than for many."

If in this stage of the contest they refuse to return to the cartel and exchange and parole all on their side, I have a right, I submit, to console myself that this wrong on their part is a greater damage to them than it is to us, without being justly subjected to the charge of cruelty.

If, then, the retaliation proposed in this resolution which is now pending does not violate the international code, if we have a right to resort to it, if it would in all probability be effective, I come back on these Senators and ask, how can you in good faith and clear conscience meet these suffering men now in these rebel prisons, if, as I have shown, the Government has used all honorable and honest means which justice could require, and which it had power to carry out in order to secure an exchange, and has been unable to do so, if you do not attempt to protect them by its adoption?

If those rebels, for the purpose of coercing unjust terms of exchange, treat our troops in their hands unjustly, with a shocking want of humanity; if shooting a man in retaliation for a cold-blooded murder has put a stop to murders on the part of rebels of inoffensive prisoners in their hands; if the exposure of their prisoners to the danger of shot and shell in front of our works in retaliation has corrected the evil; if placing eminent citizens of the rebel districts or prisoners of war on railroad trains, transports, and steamers, has to a very large extent put an end to the assassin-like mode of guerrilla warfare adopted by them, we may reasonably conclude that a just retaliation for the wrongful treatment of prisoners of war in their hands may be equally effective; and just so long as the probability is a reasonable one, it is the duty, as I maintain, of the American Government to bring it to bear—a duty that humanity itself demands.

We are morally bound, I will submit, to do everything which we can justly and honorably do to mitigate the sufferings of these brave men that have placed themselves and their lives between us and their and our country's foe. These men who have exposed themselves to every kind of hardship and danger incident to a long and bloody war have a right to our sympathies; and if we sympathize more strongly with the rebel prisoners in our hands than we do with our own brave troops held as prisoners of war by the rebels, and refuse to secure redress of their wrongs, we will have a fearful responsibility to meet before the tribunal of public opinion, when these men return home to repeat the tale of their wrongs.

The resolution, as amended, if the amendment of the Senator from Ohio should be adopted, only provides that such retaliatory measures shall be adopted as are consistent with the international code, consistent with the rules usually applied in similar cases by Christian nations. I can vote for this. I can vote for it conscientiously, believing that of the two evils it is better to accept the least. If one of two men must suffer, I prefer that it should be my enemy to my friend.

I am therefore opposed to the recommitment of the resolution. I am also opposed to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON], for the appointment of commissioners to negotiate on this subject. Probably I would not, if I did not know personally that this has been attempted and contemptuously rejected by the rebel authorities. Knowing this, as I do, I cannot myself vote for any such proposition. Nor can I vote for the amendment suggested by my friend, the other Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER]; not that I object to any principle that it contains. The enunciation of morals which is there so luminously displayed I doubt not would be indorsed by every humane and Christian man on earth; but I am not willing just now to give the rebels notice that we will not retaliate, and that, I think, is the only logical inference that can be drawn from the Senator's proposed amendment. He denounces retaliation and this cruel mode of punishment, and proposes no means as a substitute for the relief of those in the hands of the rebel authorities except the vigorous prosecution of the war.

I submit to him that this is no new remedy. Is there anybody in default now? In the name of God and my country, are we not doing all that we are now able to do to put down this rebellion? If there is anybody in default let his name be handed over for the execrations of mankind. I know of no such flagrant violation of sacred duty on the part of soldiers or civilians. I believe that all the vast resources of this great country, physical, financial, and moral, are being brought to bear, as wisely as we can reasonably expect, for the attainment of this end. It is therefore a mere suggestion that must necessarily result in nothing practicable, and serve as notice to the rebels that we will not retaliate. In other words, it would remit them to the reproach of their consciences for the violation of this code of international law, and nothing more.

Mr. SUMNER. My friend will pardon me. It is that we will not retaliate in kind, we will not imitate rebel barbarism. I say nothing further on that point.

Mr. HARLAN. I was only speaking of what I thought would be the logical effect of the adoption of the Senator's amendment. I know that the Senator believes and maintains that a nation has a right to retaliate, and, just so far forth as is necessary in order to prevent wrong by the opposing belligerent, has the right to depart from the ordinary rules that governed civilized nations in waging a war. Just so far forth as is necessary to deter him from a departure you may depart, not, of course, by resorting to cruelties, because this would have no such effect; a resort to inhuman punishment could achieve no such end. It would be the certainty of the application of the severe, but, as far as the nature of the case will admit, humane, punishment that would probably correct the evil. But nothing of this is provided in his proposed amendment.

I cannot, therefore, vote for any one of these propositions of amendment. I prefer a slight modification of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio; but perhaps a resolution that I would draw might be equally objectionable to him, so far as it departed from him, as his is to me. I shall therefore content myself, when the time comes, with voting for that resolution, and leave the consequences with posterity and God.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I think the pending motion is a motion to commit to the Committee on Military Affairs. If I understand the position of the business before the Senate it is this: The Committee on Military Affairs reported a resolution in favor of retaliation upon rebel prisoners in our hands for the treatment of Union prisoners in their hands. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] moved to amend that resolution by a substitute, striking out the whole of the resolution. The other Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] then moved to amend the substitute. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] moved further to amend by amending the original resolution before it should be stricken out. Then, if I understand the business in order before the Senate, the questions will be these: first, upon the motion to commit; and if that is negatived, then the pending question will be on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the original resolution, to perfect it before it is stricken out.

Then, Mr. President, I am opposed to the motion to commit, because it brings us directly to a test vote on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio on the original resolution. Eight months ago and more the committee on the conduct of the war published to the world this very remarkable piece of testimony. I will read it in the presence of the Senate, and of the country if I can, to show the information that was given out at that time to the public. It is the testimony of a surgeon. It is appended to the report of the committee on the conduct of the war, because it had not been received by the committee at the time they made up their report; and it is in these words:

WEST'S BUILDINGS HOSPITAL,
BALTIMORE, MARYLAND, May 24, 1864.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inclose the photograph of John Breinig, with the desired information written upon it. I am very sorry your committee could not have seen these cases when first received. No one from these pictures can form a true estimate of their condition then. Not one in ten was able to stand alone; some of them so covered and eaten by vermin that they nearly resembled cases of small-pox, and so emaciated that they were really living skeletons, and hardly that, as the result shows, forty out of one hundred and four having died up to this date.

If there has been anything so horrible, so fiendish, as this wholesale starvation in the history of this satanic rebellion, I have failed to note it. Better the massacres at Lawrence, Fort Pillow, and Plymouth, than to be thus starved to death by inches through long and weary months. I wish I had possessed the power to compel all the northern sympathizers with this rebellion to come in and look upon the work of the chivalrous sons of the hospitable and stately South when these skeletons were first received here. A rebel colonel, a prisoner here, who stood with sad face looking on as they were received, finally smook his head and walked away, apparently ashamed that he held any relations to men who could be guilty of such deeds.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. CHAPEL.

HON. B. F. WADE, Chairman of Committee on the Conduct of the War, Senate United States.

Now the point I want to make is here: this information was given to the country eight months ago and more, and it does not appear that the Administration or the parties having this business in charge have made the least effort to mitigate that suffering; and I make that point with this view, to show the necessity that Congress now should take hold, and by this resolution itself direct it to be done. I agree with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] that we cannot escape the responsibility if we do not direct it to be done. If we are satisfied that it is not being done in other quarters, and we have the power to do it, we must do it or be answerable for the consequences. No man can excuse himself by saying it belongs to somebody else. It belongs to each individual Senator here. These men are his neighbors, and his soldiers, and his friends. If he goes by, hanging his head, on the other side, the judgment of the country and of God will follow. It ought so to do.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention to another fact. Senators attempt to excuse this barbarity, on the ground that it is an occasional occurrence, and they say that sometimes rebel prisoners in our hands are treated inhumanly and therefore we must pardon this. I want to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the design and deliberation with which this has been done. Go down to the prisons in Virginia; go down to Richmond; and what do you find? You find our prisoners the moment they come to those prisons, or before, robbed of their coats, robbed of their jackets, robbed of their hats, robbed of their shoes, robbed of their stockings, and put into those prisons in this naked and destitute condition to endure the hardships and rigor of the season. The Chinese have an inhuman mode of punishment by which they condemn a man to die by never sleeping, and whenever he sits down wherever he is, or attempts to lie down and go to sleep, or is likely to fall asleep, they put somebody to pinch him and wake him up. Whenever he is sleepy again they pinch him again and wake him up, and so on. Now, sir, which is worse, that refined cruelty of the Chinese, or this barbarity which pinches a man with cold when he would go to sleep and when he wakes finds his limbs frozen? I have here in my hand a copy of a report of an officer who has been confined in Libby prison, just returned, a man from my own State, a man selected as the ranking officer in that command to make a distribution of some blankets just furnished to those prisoners, and he says it was distressing beyond account; so utterly prostrated were these men that the moment you gave them a blanket they would wrap it around them and sink on the floor and fall asleep like children, forgetful of everything in the world, their sufferings had been so intense.

Nay, more, sir, in these prisons at Richmond men have been so reduced by starvation in the rebel capital, under the eye of him whom your wandering commissioners go to plead with for peace, have been so starved, so emaciated, that for the purpose of getting something to eat they make shoes and brooms and do the work of the rebel scullions. And now shall we not retaliate? Not far from here we have a Mr. Pryor. I would take him and starve him until he made shoes and brooms, if they did not stop it.

Such is the treatment of these men in Richmond. Is it accidental? Go with me into the next State, North Carolina, at Salisbury, and take the deposition which was read at your table yesterday as to the treatment of our men there; how when they are starved and are dead they are piled into a cart and carried out and dumped into a ditch like so many dead cattle. Then go with me from Salisbury, North Carolina, to Columbia, South Carolina; go to the very home of the chivalry; and you find the same treatment exactly—not accidental, but devilish, fiendish, and malicious, and contrived and continued. There came to me from the prison in South Carolina not a fortnight ago a colonel from my own State, who had been in the jail there seventeen long months, five months of that time in solitary confinement; a man whose heart beat for your country; a man who went into Fort Wagner with his life in his hands; a man who was taken prisoner there; a man who has been held by these fiends ever since, until he has now gone home to see a family where there is a little boy three years old that he has never seen because of these enormities. And that man said to me, "For the last five months, Mr. Clark, there was not a morsel of meat in any ration issued to us; we lived upon cob meal or corn meal and sorghum, except I could buy something else. Now, sir," said he, "there are men in that prison who have so suffered that they have forgotten their own names, and they sit around on the ground chattering like so many monkeys." The ration is the same as at Salisbury.

Then go down into Georgia to Andersonville, and you find the same thing, Mr. President, precisely the same thing. From the best information, no less than thirteen thousand men have found their graves from the treatment in that one solitary place, Andersonville; and yet this is an accidental thing, they would have you believe. And if you could catch the men who do it you might punish them! Sir, the rebel authorities do it, and I would visit it upon their army.

Mr. President, we owe it to the men who have gone forth to fight our battles that these things should not be so. We owe it to the friends of the men who have gone forth to fight our battles that these things should not be so. We owe it to the country that these things should not be so, if they can be prevented; and this brings me—for I shall not be long—to the question, can these enormities be prevented? I believe they can. I believe the resolution, if adopted and carried out, will be effectual. Among our rebel prisoners, we have persons from almost every section of the confederacy, and those persons are allied to almost every family in the confederacy. I would take those rebel prisoners, and I would give notice to the confederacy, "The measure that you mete out shall be measured to you, full measure, pressed down and running over; and it shall depend exactly how it shall be done upon you; there are your prisoners; how do you want them treated?" "Well," "Then treat ours well. Just as you house our prisoners, just so will we house yours; just as you clothe them, we will clothe yours; just as you feed them, we will feed yours; just as you care for them, we will care for yours. Now, how shall it be done? What do you say?" My word for it, they will not say, "Starve," if you only stand up to it, and let them know you are determined; but if you pass the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, and say that whatever they please to do, you will not do anything, they will continue it.

Mr. SUMNER. My resolution says no such thing.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question. I ask, unless we have a commissary of prisoners in the rebel States, to visit those prisons and to see the treatment of our prisoners, how is it possible for us to mete out measure for measure?

Mr. CLARK. My God, sir, every returned prisoner is a commissary bringing back word!

Mr. HENDERSON. I suggest to the Senator, though, that all exchanges may be shut off. Such a thing is possible as that the exchanges may be cut off entirely, and then there will be no prisoners returning.

Mr. CLARK. All exchanges, perhaps, may be cut off, but the records will show in the end; and if you please, go further, and say to the confederacy, "Unless you let us see how these men are treated we will take it for granted that you are mistreating them," and hold your men accordingly.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is exactly what I want to do. My proposition is to send an agent, a commissary of prisoners, a thing done between two nations for a hundred years. The Senator from Ohio called them "commissioners." Not at all. They go there for the purpose of superintending and seeing the condition of our prisoners; that is just what I design to do, and in case they are refused permission to go, then I take it for granted that the treatment is as represented.

Mr. CLARK. And my objection to the Senator's proposition is not that it is not good in itself, but that it does not go far enough. It is only for a commissary. I want to go further and put into the President's hands and direct him to use every means in his power known in civilized war to do this.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is exactly my resolution.

Mr. CLARK. Then you and I can vote together.

Mr. HENDERSON. The objection is that I am not in favor of retaliation in kind; nor is the Senator. He says he would mete out to rebel prisoners the measure they mete out to ours. Now, I ask him this question: if they sell our prisoners, as they have sold some negroes, and inflict on them other cruelties, would he sell their prisoners?

Mr. CLARK. I need not discuss that question. This resolution does not propose retaliation in kind, as I understand.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand that the Senator is urging now before the Senate that we should mete out the same measure precisely.

Mr. CLARK. I would if it became necessary.

Mr. HENDERSON. I say it is never necessary.

Mr. CLARK. Then we shall not do it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly not.

Mr. CLARK. But if it becomes necessary, I would do it, and I would make the trial the test whether it is necessary or not.

Mr. HENDERSON. Does the Senator believe it would be necessary to sell their prisoners into everlasting slavery?

Mr. CLARK. I do not. Neither will it be necessary to starve them or strip them. The moment you tell these fiends that you are going to do to them what they do to you, they will desist in self-defense. That is exactly my idea about it. I want to bring them to the trial, and that is the object of this resolution, in my judgment. I want to bring them to the trial, and give them the opportunity; I would say, "There, it depends on you yourselves what you will do, and if you will visit these cruelties on yourselves, it is your own fault; but you pile them on your own head for your conduct."

Mr. President, I say that I believe it will not be necessary, and I will tell you why I believe it will not be necessary. First, because experience shows that when we have retaliated we have never had to go to an extreme. Take the case at Charleston. They thought to deter us from firing on Charleston by selecting six hundred of our officers and putting them where, if we did fire, we must fire upon them. I suppose some of these gentlemen would have stopped the cannon, plugged up its mouth, and said, "It will not do to fire;" but some person having that matter in charge selected six hundred of their officers and put them by our works under the rebel fire, and then said to the rebels, "Now, fire away." They did not fire. It brought about an exchange very quick. So when they took three men in Richmond whom they were going to hang for something we had done, our authorities just took the son of General Lee and two other men, and said, "Now, begin." They did not hang them.

It wants nerve, sir, and we ought to have had nerve when we began the war and all the way through. There is something ineffably mean in asking a soldier to go and fight for you when you have not nerve and backbone enough to stand by and protect him. You ask him to go and fight; you ask him to run the risk of being taken prisoner; and when they get him, you have not nerve enough to say, "Treat him well," and enforce it! No, sir, I want to direct that that shall be done; that he shall be treated well; and I will guaranty, Mr. President, I would almost guaranty it with my life, that when you take the men you have got in your power and put them to this treatment, your men will be treated well. It is because we have not done it that this treatment has gone on for these eight and twelve months, unrebuked almost, without an effort to prevent it.

Now I want to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to another thing. We are dealing with facts; we are dealing with the case as it is here; we are not dealing with a supposable case; we are dealing with the case as it is; and the evidence is that your men who are prisoners are taken into their hands and starved until they will enlist and fight for the rebels. I want to ask this question, Who is responsible in a great measure for that treason? "We," says the Senator from Ohio, and I agree with him. You let a man go into these rebel prisons; they starve him day after day; his intellect becomes feeble with his body; you do not clothe him, you do not visit him; the rebels come and hold out to him the idea of food and clothing and comfort if he will enlist for them. The intellect and the strength of the man are overcome, and left in that destitute way he enlists to fight you, with tears in his eyes it may be, and with prayers that he may be delivered; but for the sake of something to eat, (and "hunger will go through a stone wall,") he turns traitor to your country because your authorities left him there to starve. Whose treason is it, I pray you? Let us not shirk this responsibility. Let us look at the thing as it is and see if we cannot deal with it; let us at least make the trial, because we owe it to ourselves, as I said, to these soldiers, and to their friends and to the country, that we should do it.

Why, Mr. President, a few days ago I received a letter from a clergyman. He said to me, "Sir, my son is in a rebel prison; he is starving. When he went to the war I and his mother gave him to the country; but the idea is dreadful that that country, when we had given that son to it, should let that boy starve. Cannot," said he, "I appeal to you, sir; cannot something be done?" And that is not a solitary case. Every father who has a son in those prisons will appeal to his Senator in the same way; he will inquire every hour, cannot something be done to ameliorate this condition of affairs? And what are you going to say when you go home? That "nothing could be done." "But, did you try?" "No, sir; we would not pass any resolution about it; we concluded to leave that to the President." "Had not Congress the power?" "Yes, undoubtedly we had the power, but we would not do it." You tell me the country will not bear this retaliation! I tell you, sir, they will not bear such an answer as that, nor any inaction at our hands; it is the other side that they will not bear. They demand at our hands that we should remedy this difficulty if we can; and for me not another eight long months—nay, sir, not another single month, not a week, nor a day—shall go past, if I can prevent it, that I do not give my vote for a measure that I think will afford relief.

Mr. SUMNER. As I have listened to this debate, and noted the various propositions which have been brought forward, especially as I have observed how the original resolution of the committee has disappeared in the process of amendment, I have been reminded of the story which is told by Byron of Henry S. Fox, the same who was afterwards British minister here, and who now lies in the Congressional Burial Ground. Mr. Fox said of himself, after an illness in Spain, that he was "so altered that his oldest London creditor would not know him." But no illness could work a change greater than has been wrought in the resolution of the committee. Its oldest supporter could not know it in the form which it now bears. The ancient legend of the ship Argo is revived. That famous ship, after its return with the Golden Fleece, was piously preserved in the arsenal of Athens, where its decaying timbers were renewed, until, in the lapse of time, every part of the original ship had disappeared, and nothing but the name remained. It would be difficult to say that anything more of the original resolution was now before the Senate.

The resolution in its original form, as so earnestly maintained by my friends from Ohio and Michigan, called for retaliation in kind—an eye for an eye, a tooth for tooth, death for death, starvation for starvation, freezing for freezing, cruelty for cruelty. The President was commanded to imitate rebel barbarism in all respects, point by point. It was this resolution which I felt it my duty to resist. The resolutions which I offered as a substitute were intended as a sort of "earth-work" in support of this resistance. Perhaps they have already accomplished their purpose, inasmuch as Senators have evacuated their original position.

The question is solemn enough, and yet, as I think of the original resolution, I am reminded of an incident more comic than serious which occurred at Paris while it was occupied by the Prussians in 1814. A Prussian soldier was brought before the governor charged with unmercifully beating a Frenchman, with whom he was billeted, for not supplying a bottle of Berlin weiss bier which the Prussian had insisted upon drinking. The general spoke of the unreasonableness of the demand, and declared that he should be obliged to inflict severe punishment, when the Prussian soldier set up the law of retaliation. "When I was a little boy," said he, "a French dragon beat my father because he was unable to get a bottle of claret in our whole village, and I then swore that if I ever got to France I would beat a Frenchman for not getting me a bottle of weiss bier. Am I not right?" This was a case of retaliation in kind, and retrospective in its operation, like that of the original resolution.

But much as the original resolution has been changed, so that it no longer requires retaliation in kind, I think it might be changed still further. It is not enough on such an occasion, and especially after the avowals which have been made in this Chamber, to say that retaliation shall be according to the principles of public law. Montesquieu, in his Spirit of Laws, (book 1, chap. 3), has shown us the uncertainty of this language. These are his words:

"Every nation has a law of nations; even the Iroquois, who eat their prisoners. They send and receive ambassadors; they know the laws of war and peace. The evil is that their law of nations is not founded on true principles."

The resolution, therefore, for the sake of certainty, and to give double assurance that humanity shall not suffer, ought to be still further amended by limiting the retaliation to the usages of civilized society. This amendment becomes the more needful since Senators have argued that by the principles of public law the intolerable cruelties of the rebellion might be retaliated.

I desire to repeat my unalterable conviction that these cruelties cannot be retaliated in kind. And here I venture to call attention to the opinions of an illustrious citizen who was recently removed from the duties of this world. I refer to the late Edward Everett, who, in a speech at Faneuil Hall only a few days before his lamented death, thus testifies in what may be called his dying words:

"I believe that the best way in which we can retaliate upon the South for the cruel treatment of our prisoners, is for us to continue to treat their prisoners with entire humanity and all reasonable kindness; and not only so, but to seize every opportunity like the present to go beyond this."

"Indeed, it is no more than our duty to treat the prisoner well. The law of nations requires it. The Government that refuses or neglects it does not deserve the name of civilized. Even inability is no justification. If you are yourself so exhausted that you cannot supply your prisoner with a sufficient quantity of wholesome food, you are bound, with or without exchange, to set him free. You have no more right to starve than to poison him. It will, however, be borne in mind that while the hard fare of our prisoners is defended by the southern leaders, on the ground that it is as good as that of their own soldiers, at the same time they maintain that their harvests are abundant and their armies well fed. There is no merit in treating a prisoner with common humanity; it is simply infamous and wicked to treat him otherwise."

You will observe, if you please, how positively the opinion is expressed on the limits of retaliation. And here it is proper to remark that Mr. Everett was not only a patriot, who, in the later trials of the Republic, had devoted himself ably, purely, and successfully to the vindication and advancement of the national cause; but he was a publicist who had studied profoundly the law of nations. Few persons in our history have understood it better. His last labors were devoted to this important subject. At the time of his death he was preparing a course of lectures upon it. Therefore, when, in the name of the law of nations, he speaks against any imitation of rebel barbarism, it is with the voice of authority—an authority now, alas! echoed from the tomb.

From one eminent publicist I pass to another. On a former occasion I took the liberty of introducing a familiar letter on this question from Professor Lieber, once of South Carolina, now of New York. The Senator from Michigan, not content with attempting an answer to the learned professor, proceeded to use language with regard to him which I am sure his careful judgment cannot approve. Professor Lieber can need no praise from me as a practical writer and thinker on questions of international law. It was on account of his acknowledged fitness as a master of this science that he was selected as the commissioner to prepare the instructions for the armies of the United States, constituting a most important chapter of international law. Those instructions are the evidence of his ability and judgment. So long as they are followed by our Government, it will be difficult for the Senator, learned as he unquestionably is, to impeach their distinguished author. There is no Senator, not excepting the Senator from Michigan, who might not be proud to point to such a monument of fame. But he is no mere theorist. It was on the field of battle, where as a youthful soldier he was left for dead, that he began his practical acquaintance with these laws of war which he has done so much to expound.

And now let me read a commentary on the law of retaliation by this authority. I quote from an article which has already appeared in the New York Times:

"No mawkish sentimentality has induced the writer to express his views. He has had dear friends in those southern pens, which have become the very symbols of revolting barbarity, but he desires, for this very reason, that the subject be weighed without passion, which never counsels well; especially without the passion of mere vengeance. Let us bring down this general call for retaliation to practical and detailed measures. It is supposed, then, that retaliation is resolved upon; what next? The order is given to harass, starve, expose, and torture, say twenty thousand prisoners in our hands until their bones pierce the skin, and they die idiots in their filth. Why should things be demanded which every one knows the northern man is incapable of doing?"

"If, however, by retaliation be meant that captured rebels in our hands should be cut off from the pleasant comforts of life which northerners subservient to the South love to extend to them, then, indeed, we fully agree. This treasonable over-kindness ought never to have been permitted. It has had the worst effect on the arrogance of our enemy, but prohibiting it is not and cannot be called retaliation."

"Let us not be driven from the position of manly calmness and moral dignity; and let us, on the other hand, be stern, so stern that our severity shall impress the prisoners that they are such. But let us not follow rebel examples. It is too sickening, too vile."

Such is the testimony of Francis Lieber in entire but unconscious harmony with the testimony of Edward Everett. As authority nothing further can be desired. And yet the question is still debated, and grave Senators take counsel of their feelings rather than of the law.

The earnestness which has characterized this discussion attests the interest of the question, and the interest here is only a reflection of the interest throughout the country. When you speak of our brave officers and soldiers suffering, languishing, pining, dying in rebel prisons, you touch a chord which vibrates in every patriot bosom. He must be cold, sluggish, and inhuman, who is not moved to every possible effort for their redemption.

I am happy to see that the Secretary of War has not been insensible to this commanding duty. Here is an extract from a communication which he sent to the House of Representatives under date of January 21:

"On the 15th of October the subject of exchanges was placed under the direction of Lieutenant General Grant, with full authority to take any steps he might deem proper to effect the release and exchange of our soldiers and of loyal persons held as prisoners by the rebel authorities. He was instructed that it was the desire of the President that no efforts consistent with national honor should be spared to effect the prompt release of all soldiers and loyal persons in captivity to the rebels as prisoners of war, or on any other grounds, and the subject was committed to him with full authority to act in the premises as he should deem right and proper. Under this authority the subject of exchange has from that time continued in his charge, and such efforts have been made as he deemed proper to obtain the release of our prisoners. An arrangement was made for the supply of our prisoners, the articles to be distributed under the direction of our own officers, paroled for that purpose, and the corresponding privilege was extended to the rebel authorities. In order to afford every facility for relief, special exchanges have been offered whenever desired on behalf of our prisoners. Such exchanges have in a few instances been permitted by the rebel authorities, but in many others they have been denied. A large number of exchanges, including all the sick, has been effected within a recent period. The commissary general of prisoners has been directed to make a detailed report of all the exchanges that have been accomplished since the general exchange ceased. He will furnish it to the House of Representatives as soon as completed. The last communication of General Grant gives reason to believe that a full and complete exchange of all prisoners will speedily be made. It also appears from his statement that weekly supplies are furnished to our prisoners and distributed by officers of our own selection."

Let these instructions be followed, and it is difficult to see what remains to be done. Exchange, retaliation, and every other agency "right and proper," are fully authorized in the discretion of the commanding general. There is nothing in the arsenal of war which he may not employ. What more is needed? But this brings me again to the proposition before the Senate.

The committee, not content with what has been done—distrustful, perhaps, of the commanding general—have proposed that Congress shall instruct the President to enter upon a system of retaliation, where we shall imitate as precisely as possible rebel barbarism, and make our prisons the same scenes of torment which we denounce. Why, sir, to state the case is to answer it. The Senator from Michigan who advocates so eloquently this unprecedented retaliation attempted a description of the torments of the rebel prisons; but language failed him. After speaking of their "immeasurable criminality" and "the horrors of these scenes," which he said were "absolutely indescribable," he proceeded to ask that we should do these same things; that we should take the lives of prisoners, even by freezing and starvation, or turn them into living skeletons—by act of Congress.

Sir, the law of retaliation, which he invokes, has its limits, and these are found in the laws of civilized society. Admit the law of retaliation; but you cannot escape from its circumscription. As well undertake to escape from the planet on which we live. What civilization forbids cannot be done. Your enemy may be barbarous and cruel, but you cannot be barbarous and cruel. The rule is clear and unquestionable. Perhaps the true principle of law on this precise question was never better expressed than by one of our masters, Shakspeare, jurist as well as poet, when he makes Macbeth exclaim—

"I dare do all that may become a man;
Who dares do more is none."

So with us now. We are permitted to do all that may become a man; but nothing more.

But surely nobody will argue that the "barbarities of Andersonville" and all those torments which we deplore can become a man. As well might we undertake, by way of retaliation, to revive the boot and thumb-screw of the Inquisition, the fires of Smithfield, "Luke's iron crown and Damien's bed of steel," or to repeat that execrable crime which is pictured by Dante in one of his most admired passages, where Ugolino and his children were shut up in a tower, without food or water, and left to die slowly, cruelly, wickedly, by starvation:

"Thou modern Thebes! what though, as fame hath said
Count Ugolino did thy forts betray—
His sons deserved not punishment so dread."

Thanks to the immortal poet who has blasted forever this sickening enormity, and rendered its imitation impossible. Thanks to that mighty voice which has given new sanction to the mandate of public law. And yet in this terrible case there was retaliation, and the famished victim is revealed as gnawing the skull of his tyrant. But this was not on earth.

It is when we consider precisely the conduct of the rebels, as it has been represented; when we read the stories of their atrocities; when we call to mind the sufferings of our men in their hands; when we gaze on the pictures introduced into this discussion, where art has sought to represent the living skeletons; when the whole scene in all its horror is before us, and our souls are filled with unutterable anguish, that we confess how difficult, how absolutely impossible, it is for us to follow this savage example. And just in proportion as the treatment of our prisoners transcends the usages of civilized society, must the example be rejected. Such is the law which you cannot disobey.

Do not, I pray you, consider me indifferent to the condition of those unhappy prisoners. I do not yield to the committee or to any Senator in ardor or anxiety for their protection. Whatever can be done I am ready to do. But, as American citizens, they have an interest that we should do nothing by which our country shall forfeit that great place which belongs to it in the vanguard of the nations. It cannot be best for them that our country should do an unworthy thing. It cannot be best for them that our national destiny should be thus darkened. Duties are in proportion to destinies, and from the very heights of our example I argue again that we cannot allow ourselves, under any passing passion or resentment, to stoop to a policy which history must condemn. There is not a patriot soldier who would not say, "Let me suffer, but save my country."

Mr. President, it is with pain that I differ from valued friends on this occasion, whose friendship is among the treasures of my life. But I cannot help it. I cannot do otherwise. It is long since I first raised my voice in this Chamber against the "barbarism of slavery," and I have never ceased to denounce it in season and out of season. But the rebellion is nothing but that very barbarism armed for battle. Plainly it is our duty to overcome it; not to imitate it. And here I stand.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I was pleased and instructed by the reference which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, who has just taken his seat, made to the incident he related of Mr. Fox, who said he had got so altered that his oldest creditors would not know him. I think something like that has occurred to this resolution; but notwithstanding the fact that it has been so altered, and that about everything which was exceptionable in it has been stricken out, still the Senator from Massachusetts cannot see it except as it was before any alteration was made; and the beautiful philippic that he has delivered against "retaliation in kind" is delivered against a kind of resolution that has got nothing of the kind in it, [laughter,] because all that has been stricken out by the motion of the honorable Senator from Ohio.

That is enough on that part of the case; but there is one branch of this subject which has been alluded to by two Senators who have addressed the Senate, one the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] in very bold and explicit terms, as he always does—whatever he does say he says plainly and boldly—and the other the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who, if I understood him, though I have not his remarks before me, was not quite so explicit, but I think he had the same sentiments, to which I desire to refer for a few moments.

I would have been glad if the honorable Senator from Kentucky could have discussed this subject of the barbarity of the rebels to our prisoners without going out of the way to make his philippic equally severe against his own Government; for all the thunders which he denounces against the rebellion and against the rebels he says should be visited with equal force upon our own Government. Perhaps it was too much to expect the Senator from Kentucky at this time of life and of his senatorial experience to begin to make a speech which did not have that essential ingredient of denunciation of the President in it. The Senator has said, and well said, that the laws of war and the laws of retaliation have been very much ameliorated. That is true; but I think in the speech he made he gave evidence that the laws of forensic debate in this body have been exceedingly ameliorated, more so than the laws in relation to war, or in relation to retaliation. When I heard the Senator from Kentucky larding and illustrating his speech with high-wrought eulogium on the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] I said "There is a change here also not less remarkable than the change in regard to war and in regard to retaliation." [Laughter.]

But, sir, I will return to the point upon which I rose to address a few words to the Senate, and that was a remark made by the Senators from Kentucky and Maryland; and if I do them injustice I am willing to be corrected. The Senator from Kentucky, if I understood him, I will not undertake to give his words, but the idea, said, in substance, that if the only obstruction to the exchange of prisoners grows out of a refusal on the part of the rebels to exchange colored prisoners, the exchange ought to go on nevertheless, and the colored prisoners left in prison or in confinement; and I understood the Senator from Maryland to make substantially the same averment: that if the treatment of our colored prisoners was the only obstacle in the way of these exchanges, they ought to be left in prison. Against that sentiment I wish—

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator allow me to explain my position?

Mr. HALE. I think I have stated the Senator's position in substance.

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, no; that was not my position.

Mr. HALE. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator did not state me exactly right. My position was this: that if any class of Union prisoners, without regard to color, could be exchanged by our Government, it was the duty of our Government to make the exchange, and not to permit the fact that another class of prisoners cannot be exchanged to be an obstacle to the exchange of those who can be exchanged, and that without regard to color.

Mr. HALE. That is a modified statement of the position, but the sentiment is the same. That sentiment, that opinion, and that position I deny utterly. If this Government, having called to its defense this most defenseless class, a class who are without rights, without the right to protect themselves or the right to seek protection under a Government of law—if this Government, in this gigantic struggle for its existence, has called upon that defenseless portion of its people to come into the ranks and fight its battles, if there is one duty on earth binding above all other duties upon this Government, it is to see that every protection consistent with the state of war and the laws of war and the rights of war are extended to that defenseless portion of our soldiery. Sir, look at them. What are they? The highest judicial tribunal of the land has said they were a class with no rights that white men were bound to respect; they were the outcasts and the down-trodden of earth; the common rights of humanity denied to them; holden, instead of being considered as men, like beasts of burden, and sold like them on the auction block. This country, in its hour of necessity and emergency, has called upon these men, and they have come forward; and the testimony of all your officers is that they have fought with a courage, a heroism, a bravery, and a devotion unsurpassed by any of your soldiers. The proposition that if they be captured and held by the rebels as prisoners they may be neglected and overlooked in any contingency is to my mind monstrous, and would stamp this Government before all posterity and all time as guilty of the most infamous position they could take. When you called a black man into your Army, when you gave him your uniform and made him a soldier, he became a soldier to all intents and purposes; and if there is one class more than another that has a right in the hour of its distress to appeal to the Government for protection, it is that most helpless and most defenseless class that you have put into your Army. I say that if the Government, in its negotiations for exchanges, consents to the shadow of a shade of difference that shall operate to the disadvantage of the colored soldier, they are treacherous to the highest trusts that have been confided to them, and false and recreant to the first principles of duty which the position of these men imposes upon the Government.

I desire to make these remarks in order that this sentiment might not go out unchallenged before the country. I repeat again that in proportion to their defenseless position they have the higher claim upon the Government. What is the history of it? We began this war without their help. We were disposed to ignore them. We treated them in the manner in which the public policy of the General Government had treated them. But, sir, the God of nations and the God of justice taught us a terrible lesson. We were slow to learn it, but we learned it at last. We learned that in this gigantic strife it was necessary to our final success, to secure the blessing of the God of nations, that we should use for our defense in this struggle this very class of our population. We have called on them; we have called them into our service by hundreds and thousands, and by our legislation we are inviting them there again, and our armies in a great measure are filled up with them. What will be the effect, what will be the consequence, if it be proclaimed to-day that the Government of the United States have adopted a policy which looks to the exchange of their white prisoners, leaving the black prisoners to their fate?

Mr. HOWARD. If my respected friend from New Hampshire will permit me, I will put him one question connected with this matter. It has been often remarked in this body that the rebel authorities will never consent to the exchange of the Union black prisoners in their own hands for their own prisoners taken by us. Suppose the rebel Government should absolutely refuse to recognize the right of the black prisoner to be treated as a prisoner of war, and therefore to be exchanged; suppose they persistently refuse to include the black man in the cartel of exchange in any form whatever, and insist upon holding him in perpetual captivity both as a prisoner of war and as a slave, as they intend to do according to our best information; I ask my friend from New Hampshire now in what way he will enforce that rule of war by which a captor is bound to surrender up his captive at the end of the war. How are we to get possession of these Union prisoners who have a black skin unless it be by a direct retaliation in kind upon rebel prisoners in our hands? How are we to recover them except by retaining in captivity the rebels who are in our hands as prisoners of war? What other way is there to get them except by retaliation in kind or by a generous ransom to be paid in money or cotton, or some other mode? That brings us back at once to the consideration of the question of the propriety of resorting to retaliatory measures in kind.

Mr. HALE. I do not see that that question is exactly pertinent to the train of argument I was pursuing. I have always thought much of the wisdom of the answer that used to be given by a magistrate whom I used to practice before when I practiced law in my early days. If there was any fine-spun question raised which he did not see had a pertinent bearing to the issue, he would say, "Stop a moment; I am not going to spend my judgment on that now." [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. It is one you have got to meet, and that soon.

Mr. HALE. Well, sir, I will put a parallel case: if the rebels refuse to treat captive colored men as prisoners, and the Government knows it, and yet the Government invites colored persons to enlist in the Army and go out and fight its battles, and puts them in a position where they are liable to be taken prisoners; I say, if this Government abandons them to their fate, without putting forth every energy at its command for their salvation as its first duty, the Government is infamous before the nations.

Mr. HOWARD. I say amen to that.

Mr. HALE. Then we agree upon that. That is what I say; that is the point upon which I stand; it is the only thing upon which I rose to say anything. I repeat, by taking these men into our ranks, clothing them with our uniform, making them soldiers, putting them in a condition where they are liable to be taken prisoners, we are bound by every consideration of honor and of humanity to stand by them, not to leave them for a moment, but to put forth all the energy and power we can possibly do to save them. It was for the purpose of saying this I rose, and having said it, I leave the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member from New Hampshire, I am sure, has no purpose to misrepresent me in anything I have said on this or any other occasion, but although he may have no purpose to misrepresent me, if he will see that he has misunderstood me he will be satisfied that he has practically misrepresented me.

What I said was that it was our duty to effect an exchange to every extent to which we could accomplish it; that if one of the difficulties of making that exchange coextensive with the necessity of the entire case, so as to embrace all the prisoners that the rebels may have in their hands, was their refusal to exchange that portion of such prisoners as belonged to the African race, it was incumbent upon the Government to exchange so many of their prisoners for so many of ours as could be accomplished, retaining in our hands as many of their prisoners, man for man, as would equal in number those of the black prisoners of ours in their hands, not to abandon them to the mercies of the rebels, but not to make that difficulty such an impediment that we will abandon our obligation to our white soldiers.

I put it to the Senator from New Hampshire whether, if this state of things shall exist, he would be willing that there should be no exchanges. We have of their prisoners, say thirty thousand; they have of ours thirty thousand; and of that thirty thousand ten thousand are colored soldiers. They are willing to exchange the twenty thousand that they have of white soldiers for the twenty thousand that we have of their white soldiers; but the United States say, No; we will do no such thing; we will leave in rebel imprisonment, subject to all the cruelties to which they are subjected, the entire white soldiery of the United States, because we are unable to get back more than a portion of our soldiers, the rebels having decided, or being supposed to have determined, that they would not release any of their black prisoners. Does the honorable member say that would be right? He feels for the black soldier not more strongly than I do. I have said before, upon this floor, at the last session, and, I believe, at the present session, that I would go as far as any Senator in protecting any black man who might be enlisted into the service of the United States, and shouldered his musket to protect the rights of the United States; but while I feel all the sympathy and all the obligation consequent upon the extent of that proper sympathy to the black prisoner, I cannot forget that there is sympathy due to the white soldier, and an obligation growing out of that sentiment.

Let me suppose the case to be now as it was at one time as proved by the testimony before us: starvation is going on; cruelty of every description is going on; our white men are dying in consequence of that treatment; they are dying by the scores; and those who have not been relieved from suffering are sustaining a punishment a great deal worse than death; an appeal is now made to the honorable member from Ohio, who has tens of thousands of white soldiers from New Hampshire in those prisons thus being tortured, and he is told, "You can get them out if you will give in exchange for them ten thousand white men; but we have ten thousand black men whom we will not exchange; we think they are not entitled to the privileges due to a state of war, to prisoners; they are not prisoners according to our view; they are slaves; and we will not extend to them the doctrine of exchange;" would he suffer his ten thousand New Hampshire white men to lie in prison until they died because he could not get a proportion of blacks? Would he not say, "I am willing to exchange, my object being to get an entire exchange, but failing in that I am willing to exchange man for man; I say that the black soldier is as much a soldier as the white man, and I will hold on to the prisoners that I have in my hands sufficient to meet the number of black soldiers that you may have in your hands?" But if they are willing to exchange the rest would he refuse it? Could he face his own people and refuse it upon the ground that those poor black men are more defenseless than the white men? In that situation the white man is as defenseless as the black; they have alike fallen into the hands of the barbarians; they are subjected to all the tortures known only to a savage nature. You can relieve a part, but you refuse it upon the ground that you cannot relieve all. I submit—and I am perfectly willing that the judgment of the country shall be pronounced upon that; I am perfectly willing that the judgment of the white soldiers and the black soldiers shall be pronounced upon that—I submit to the honorable member from New Hampshire whether the duty is not an imperative one to rescue from the thrall-dom in which the white soldier is, as many of them as it is possible to rescue, keeping in our hands as many as can be made to answer for the refusal to exchange the black soldiers.

Wedded as the honorable member is (and I am far from blaming him) in attachment to the black, in a disposition to place him in all respects on the same footing with the white, perhaps socially for aught I know, but, politically, in the eye of the law to give him all the rights to which the white man is entitled, I suppose he has not gone to the extent of saying that he is entitled to more rights; that he will punish the white without necessity in order to prevent the black from being punished. Let me reverse it, and what would be his answer? If I understand him he wants the black man out. Suppose the rebels say, "We will let him out, but we will not exchange the white man; our antipathy to the white race of the North is so great that him I will hold, him I will starve, but you may have the black soldier," would the honorable member be for taking the black soldier out and leaving the white man to suffer? I presume he would. I think his heart would tell him that he should. If he would pursue that course in a case of that description, why is it that he will not obtain the release of the white man because the rebels refuse to exchange the black man? The obligation in each case is precisely alike, as I submit to the honorable member.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator from Maryland has stated very distinctly the position which I have always occupied in relation to this question. I frankly admit that if negro captives and white captives belonging to the Army of the United States are in rebel prisons I feel a deeper and stronger sympathy for the white prisoners than I do for the negroes, because I feel more affinity and more interest to and for the white race than I do for the black. It is my race. I make this avowal: that if there were ten thousand negro soldiers and ten thousand white captive soldiers in the rebel prisons, and I had the option to save one prisoner, he should be a white prisoner; if I had the power to save half of the whole twenty thousand, none of the white prisoners should perish. I would endeavor to save the negro prisoners also, but not until the deliverance of the whites was accomplished. Whenever and wherever either the white or negro races are to be destroyed, and I can save either one and not the other, all my instincts would impel me to rescue the white. Other men might make a different election.

But upon this question of negro prisoners I have always distinctly avowed, even as long ago as December, 1863, the position that, when a negro is admitted by the United States Government into its armies, it is the duty of that Government to do everything it can for the protection and preservation of the negro soldier, whether he be at the time serving in the ranks of our armies, or languishing in the prisons of our enemies; and I make the same declaration now. But here was the point which I endeavored to make yesterday and the day before, and which I made distinctly in the Senate in December, 1863. The Secretary of War, in his annual report of that year, portrayed the condition of things in Libby prison, and he then brought to the attention of Congress and to the nation the very condition, to some very considerable extent, of our prisoners that has been portrayed in the report read by the honorable Senator from Michigan; that our prisoners there were in want, that they were insufficiently fed; that they were not sufficiently clothed or housed; that from the scarcity of food and disease consequent upon it, and the want of medical attention, and exposure, they were perishing; and that report, which I now have before me, admits in effect that our Government was not prosecuting this work of exchanging prisoners, and the reason was, as I understand the statement of the Secretary, because the rebels had refused to exchange colored troops and their officers for white rebel soldiers who were prisoners. My position was that if the authorities of the United States had the overture, the option, the opportunity to exchange white Union soldiers who are in rebel prisons suffering such tortures, and dying rapidly from day to day, and refused to make the exchange because the rebel authorities would not exchange the negro prisoners they held for them, our Government, in that respect, was delinquent, and it was little less delinquent and horribly delinquent than the rebel authorities who thus doomed our unfortunate and brave soldiers to such a dreadful fate as death by starvation. I maintain that position now. I have maintained it ever. It is the dictate of my reason and of my heart, and I boldly advocate it here and now, as I did fourteen months since.

Now, Mr. President, what was and is my complaint? I called the attention of the Senate to it by a resolution offered in December, 1863, asking the War Office for all the correspondence between the two Governments and their authorities on the subject of the exchange of prisoners; and that correspondence was in a few weeks after the adoption of the resolution sent to the Senate. I propose to read some extracts from it. But, sir, that was the apt time for the interposition of Congress, for the operation of deep and humane and stirring sympathies, for the eloquent denunciation of rebel cruelty with which this Chamber has responded for the last three or four days. Why was not the Executive and the Secretary of War and the nation then invoked to come to the contemplation of this subject, and to act upon it as duty, justice, and humanity demanded—to take action that would avert the continuance of the inhuman wrongs that were being done to our gallant but unfortunate soldiers in rebel prisons?

The honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] and myself differ upon one point. I maintained that the authorities of the United States had opportunities, had overtures, had offers to them by the rebel authorities to exchange the white prisoners who were privates, man for man, for their soldiers captured and held by the United States. My honorable friend controverts that position. I am here with a little authority contained in this report of the War Office to sustain, yea, to maintain it. I here avow that my sentiment and judgment in relation to this matter is this, and I will state it in terms so distinct that gentlemen cannot misunderstand me—I stated it as distinctly in December, 1863—that, if the authorities of the United States had or could make the opportunity of having all the negro soldiers exchanged, and the rebels refused to exchange the white soldiers belonging to the United States Army who were in rebel prisons, it was the duty of our authorities to agree to such exchange, limited as it would be to our negro soldiers.

I also made the converse proposition, that if our authorities had or could make the opportunity to exchange white Union soldiers held in rebel prisons, to the whole or to any extent whatever, it was their duty, not to the rebel government, but to the Union patriots who were languishing and dying in such horrible prisons, to make exchanges to the whole or any extent of their numbers, even though the rebel authorities refused absolutely to give in exchange negro soldiers and their officers, and would give only white men who had never had negro commands.

I will state the proposition in another form. Suppose that in all the rebel prisons there were thirty thousand soldiers in captivity; that one tenth of them were officers, and the other nine tenths private soldiers, and from any motive whatever the rebel authorities offered that they would exchange the private soldiers, but not the officers; I submit to gentlemen this question: after reasonable efforts made by our Government to induce the rebel authorities to exchange for officers as well as private soldiers, and after all these efforts had failed, if the option was still left to them to exchange for the private soldiers, nine tenths of our countrymen who were perishing from starvation and exposed to the wintry elements, would it not be the imperative duty of our authorities to exchange for these nine tenths? Or should they be left to the horrible fate of the other tenth because the rebels would not exchange for them? What claim of justice or humanity would such course satisfy? What alleviation of the horrid sufferings of the inevitably doomed one tenth would it be for their common Government to refuse to rescue nine times as many of their comrades from such a dreary death, because it could not force a cruel and inexorable foe to deliver up from it the other tenth? Misery is said to love company; but believe me, the noble and brave American soldier, if left himself to decide the point, would never invite his comrades to be company to such a havoc of death.

Now, I make a proposition another step in advance: that if a few hundred, or a few thousand, or any number of negro soldiers were in rebel prisons, and their officers also, if you please, and the rebel authorities were unwilling, upon some principle of right or policy, or from any cause whatever, to exchange those negro soldiers and their officers, but were willing and were to offer to exchange their other white prisoners, the authorities of the United States, after having exhausted all reasonable effort to obtain a full exchange, comprehending each class and the whole, when such an effort as that had failed, and the only choice left was to exchange for the white private soldiers and officers who had not commanded negroes or permit them all to remain and all to perish by starvation and exposure, it would be the duty, however painful, of our authorities to accept the proposition in the form in which the rebels had made it.

Now, Mr. President, let me read a little from the report of this correspondence between the United States and the confederacy, to show some of the propositions that were made and rejected by the parties in relation to the exchange of prisoners. I propose to show that the United States authorities had the option offered to them again and again to exchange for all the white private soldiers belonging to our Army held by the rebels in captivity, and that our authorities refused to accede to it. As long ago as January, 1863, what did Jefferson Davis, the president of the confederacy, say in his proclamation from which this difficulty about exchanging negroes first originated?

"The enlisted soldiers I shall continue to treat as unwilling instruments in the commission of these crimes, and shall direct their discharge and return to their homes on the proper and usual parole."

He did not even require an exchange for the common soldier, but whenever there were white men prisoners in the confederacy he here declares his purpose to treat them, even when they were stirring up slaves in the confederate States to uniting against their masters, and the government of their masters, as they contended as unwilling instruments, and to liberate them upon their proper and usual parole, that they might return to their homes.

I will next read from a communication of Mr. Ould, dated War Department, Richmond, Virginia, July 26, 1863, to our commissioner for exchanges in which he, as the rebel commissioner, says:

"If, at this time, you have any officers of the rank I have declared exchanged, or of any other rank, or if you have any particular organization of privates or non-commissioned officers whom you wish exchanged, you have only to state such fact and your selection will be approved. If you hold the paroles of our officers of any rank, as you state, you have only to present them, and whatever is in our hands, whether on parole or in captivity, will be freely given in exchange for them."

Now, sir, here is the full, explicit, unreserved, unconditional promise of this commissioner of exchange that the authorities of the United States might make their own selection among all the private soldiers and officers held in captivity by the rebel armies or who were on their parole, that did not come within the particular interdiction of Jeff. Davis's proclamation; and that the whole of them should be exchanged for rebel soldiers who were held by the Union armies as captives. This proposition was not accepted by our authorities, but was treated by them with cold neglect.

Colonel Ludlow was relieved as United States agent for the exchange of prisoners, and that excellent gentleman, that intelligent citizen and soldier, that loyal and true man, General Meredith, of Indiana, whose acquaintance I have the pleasure and honor to enjoy, was appointed his successor. He went down to Fortress Monroe to enter upon this business, the exchange of prisoners. He says, in a communication to General Halleck, that his predecessor was reticent on the subject; I believe that is the phrase, "reticent;" I should have said "reserved," in my old-fashioned lingo. At any rate, he was not communicative, and General Meredith undertook the examination of his books, and he gathered from those books, which he says had been badly kept, what were the obstacles in the way of a free and full exchange, and in this letter to the General-in-Chief he stated them thus:

"From what I can gather in Colonel Ludlow's letter books, I suppose the following are points to be insisted upon:

"1. The immediate exchange of Colonel Streight and his command.

"2. An agreement that Dr. Green shall be held by the United States Government as a hostage for Dr. Rucker; other surgeons to be exchanged.

"3. That all officers commanding negro troops, and negro troops themselves, shall be treated as other prisoners of war, and exchanged in the same way."

There is the chief difficulty, stated in the most precise language. It was that the negro soldiers and their officers should be treated as other prisoners, and exchanged in the same way; and that it should be insisted upon by him as it had been by his predecessor.

This communication of General Meredith was dated August 7, 1863, and on the 12th of the same month General Halleck replied to it, and from his reply I read:

"In order, however, to avoid any difficulty on this point, General Meredith will be authorized to agree with Mr. Ould that all paroles given by officers and men on either side, between the 23d of May and the 3d of July, not in conformity with the stipulations of the cartel be regarded as null and void, a declaration to that effect being published to the armies of both belligerents.

"The other three points mentioned in General Meredith's letter of the 7th instant seem to be fully understood by him. The Government of the United States will, under no circumstances, yield to either of these points."

General Meredith was thus instructed by the General-in-Chief that he fully understood the three points, and that they formed an ultimatum, "that all officers of negro troops and negro troops themselves shall be treated as prisoners of war, and exchanged in the same way."

But that is not all on this point. Here is an extract from another letter from General Meredith to the War Department, dated Fortress Monroe, September 23, 1863:

"Mr. Ould made the following proposition: 'That all officers and men on both sides be released, unless there be actual charges against them. If officers or men are held on charges which their Government consider unjust, let one or more hostages be held for such. If there be charges against officers and men, and they are not tried on the same within a reasonable time, (to be agreed upon,) they are to be discharged.'

Now, sir, as to the great mass of white prisoners from our Army held in rebel prisons, here was a proposition for their immediate and unconditional release by exchange or upon parole, to be reciprocal between the parties. If this proposition had been accepted, more than nine tenths of our soldiers in captivity would then have gone free. But how was this proposition received by our authorities? General Hitchcock, who was the chief in control of the exchange of prisoners, in this city, wrote, in reply to that proposition of Mr. Ould, through General Meredith, as follows, on the 26th September, 1863:

"The proposition submitted as from Mr. Ould, in your letter of 23d instant, 'that all officers and men on both sides be released, unless there be actual charges against them,' &c., is not accepted. The effort to make a distinction between officers serving with different species of troops can receive no countenance whatever."

The proposition of the rebel commissioner was for the release of all officers and men on both sides against whom there were no charges. It was objected to by General Hitchcock for the single cause that it was an "effort to make a distinction between officers serving with different species of troops," and for that cause would receive no countenance whatever. The fair inference is that as to the men there was no objection, otherwise it would have been stated. Why, then, was it not agreed, or proposed by our authorities that the men should be mutually released? Because it was their settled purpose, a sine qua non, that men and officers should be exchanged together; that if the rebel authorities would detain the officers, the men too should stay and perish with them.

The rebel proposition was, "We will release all your officers and men against whom we have no charges of the commission of crime on condition that you will release ours against whom you have no charges held by you." This proposition was rejected by our authorities, and the torture of nine tenths of our brave and patriotic men, whom they might have delivered, they thus permitted to proceed to its dread consummation. In my judgment this was not only a mistake, not only injustice, but a shocking crime committed by our authorities.

Sir, we have heard in debate and we have seen from documents read here, that it was objected to exchanging these brave unfortunate men that already a great many of them were nearly starved to death; and if they were exchanged, healthy, vigorous rebels, ready to take up arms and do efficient service in the rebel cause, would be given for dying, starving Union patriots, many of whose terms of service were about to expire. Sir, such a consideration, instead of being a reason for denying the exchange, for delaying it, for protracting it, is among the strongest reasons that could address themselves to my mind and to my heart why we should have accepted the exchange with all the speed possible. If any portion of those men had apparently but a day to live, if they were physically capable of enduring their tortures but a single day, and that day could have been saved to the soldier, and given to his proper nursing and treatment to snatch him from a grave that was already apparently opening for him, haste should have been made to seize the opportunity lest it should be lost forever. Not only humanity, but patriotism and justice demanded this as the last hope to save the starving, dying patriot soldier, and to restore him to his home and his family.

Mr. HALE. I beg to interrupt the Senator to inquire if he would not rather have a whole day. If so I will move an adjournment.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator is one of the most liberal gentlemen I know; but I believe I will give him the next day, or rather I think he and I can occupy the next day by advocating a committee to investigate the enormous and gigantic frauds and corruptions that have been perpetrated on this Government, and which he so eloquently portrayed this morning. Sir, I have come nearly to a conclusion. Here is what General Meredith said again in a letter to the War Department:

"In reply to my demand for the release of Colonel Streight and his command, I was informed that they were in Richmond held as other prisoners of war, and will be exchanged when exchanges of officers are resumed. In relation to Dr. Rucker, Mr. Ould referred me to his letter of August 16, which I have the honor to forward herewith."

"To my demand 'that all officers commanding negro troops, and negro troops themselves, should be treated as other prisoners of war, and be exchanged as such,' Mr. Ould declined acceding, remarking that they (the rebels) would 'die in the last ditch' before giving up the right to send slaves back to slavery as property recaptured, but that they were willing to make exceptions in the case of free blacks."

Thus it appears they were willing to yield for exchange all the white private soldiers, all free negro soldiers, but they would die in the last ditch before they would give in exchange negroes who by the constitution and laws of their States were the property of their own people. They insisted, as they ought with their views to have insisted, upon their right and obligation to the people of their own States, and of their own confederacy, whenever negro property came into the hands of their military authorities that belonged to their citizens by the constitution and laws of Virginia, and the other confederate States, that it was their duty to return that property back to its owners.

"He could not exactly tell me how his authorities intended to distinguish between the two, (free and slave,) but presumed that evidence as to the fact of freedom would be taken into consideration. As their laws put slave and free upon the same footing, no comment is necessary."

Furthermore:

"An informal proposition was made to the following effect: 'To exchange officer for officer of the same grade, except such as are in command of negro troops,' which was declined."

The rebel authorities there made a proposition with three branches. First, that all the white private soldiers on both sides should be exchanged; second, that all the free negroes who were free at the time they entered the Army, and whose freedom would be subject of proof, should be exchanged; and then the further proposition to exchange officer for officer of the same grade, except such as were in command of negro troops; and this proposition was declined, inflexibly and unconditionally declined, by our authorities. That reduced the whole matter to this point: they retained the negroes who were the property of people living in the confederate States to surrender them to their owners. They were induced to do that because the constitution and laws of those States gave to those owners a right to that property, and their own men in authority had that property in possession, and therefore it was their duty to yield it up to its owners. They then made a proposition to exchange officer for officer, retaining only those who commanded negro troops, and a further proposition that those officers should be tried—I do not know whether by a military court or not, but I hope not. God deliver the civilian from a military court. If I was the monarch of this land a little while, there is not a man who has ordered a civilian to be tried by a military court, and there is not a military man who has acted as judge advocate of such court, or has been a member of such a court, and has pronounced judgment in violation of the plain letter of the Constitution, and of the liberty it guarantees to the citizen, that I would not bring to instant and condign punishment by hanging him as high as Haman.

Mr. HOWARD. Without trial?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; I would try him by the civil courts, I would try him by a jury of his peers. He should not be condemned and executed unless he was condemned according to the course of the common law recognized by our Constitution and fought for by our fathers throughout the revolutionary war. Never, sir, should any man, except one in the naval or military service of the United States, be tried or punished in any other way than by a fair trial by a jury of his peers according to the course of the common law.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. DAVIS. I shall be done in a minute, and then you shall have all the time after me.

Several SENATORS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not rise for the purpose of moving an adjournment, but I am not perfectly sure that I understand the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator has plunged in medias res. I am extremely anxious to comprehend him.

Mr. DAVIS. I will endeavor to make myself comprehensible.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator from Kentucky will pardon me, I should like to be enlightened on this point: whether, if he was the omnipotent magistrate that he speaks of, he would permit his officers who had been in the command of negro troops, and who had fallen into the hands of the enemy as prisoners of war, to be tried by their captors for the crime of having commanded his black troops? This is the question upon which I wish his opinion. He rather shied the main point.

Mr. DAVIS. I will give you a categorical answer if you will just allow me the opportunity.

Mr. HOWARD. That is what I want, a categorical answer.

Mr. DAVIS. I would not.

Mr. HOWARD. I thought not.

Mr. DAVIS. I would not; but I would say this, that if my effort to defeat such a trial as that could not prevail, I would never consent that the failure of my effort to defeat such a trial should prevent me from agreeing to the exchange of every private soldier held in rebel captivity. And I say that an officer or a Government or an authority that would make the failure of the attempt to defeat such a trial the reason for holding thirty thousand Union patriots in starving rebel prisons and bringing them to an inevitable, lingering, horrible death, would deserve the same fate as the unfortunate soldiery that were thus suffering, and I wish I could make this exchange; I wish I could send those men who prevented our gallant soldiers from deliverance from such a dungeon to all the horrors and to the inevitable fate of that dungeon.

"Mr. Ould expresses a willingness to release all chaplains. I have given, I believe, the substance of all that took place. According to your instructions, I avoid much discussion. No agreement was made."

That is what General Meredith announced. To all these liberal propositions, if I may use the term, and I do—they would not be liberal in relation to a Christian and humane nation, but they were liberal when compared with the course of the rebels—there was one cold, inexorable, absolute denial, when if this assent had been given, one of the greatest jubilees that was ever seen upon earth, at least in this quarter of the globe, would have been exhibited by thirty thousand starving, emaciated, wasting, doomed prisoners marching forth from their horrible dungeons and exchanging them for all the comforts and blessings of home.

I do not want any man given up, yielded, to such a fate, and I say that it was the duty of our Government to contend for the exchange of the negro soldier, and it was the duty of our Government to contend for the exchange of Colonel Streight, and it was the duty of our Government to contend, and to contend persistently and resolutely, for the exchange of every man who has rendered service in our armies. My position is simply that when such an effort has been made and has failed, it is the duty of the Government then to suspend the fate and the question in relation to the disputed cases, and to give exchange and freedom to all that the rebel authorities are willing to exchange.

It was not only the duty of the Government to have accepted the overture but to have offered the proposition. I make the case stronger, and say that when our military authorities saw that the negro soldiers and the officers of negro soldiers were in the way of the exchange and liberty of thirty thousand other soldiers who did not come within that category, it was the duty of our Government to have said to the rebel authorities, "Let us hold up and suspend the question and the fate of the negro soldiers and their officers; let their fate no longer interfere with, let it not defeat or defer the liberties of those against whom no such objection exists; but we exhort you, we demand of you in the cause of humanity, by the sacred rights of all manhood, to consent to the exchange of every private soldier and every free negro and every single man who does not come within the reason of your difficulty."

I say, sir, that it was the duty of our Government not only to have accepted the opportunity, but to have made the opportunity, to have urged it, to have offered the proposition, and by every force of reason and appeal to heart, to soul, and to humanity, and by every other proper force that can operate upon human nature, to have enforced such an offer; not only to have availed itself of this action of the other side, but to have offered it; and it is for that reason that I condemned fourteen months ago, that I condemn now, and expect to condemn to the day of my death, a barbarous, inhuman, cold, calculating, politician-like policy of our Government, the men whom these brave martyrs had put in power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor in the chair.) The question is on recommending the joint resolution and all pending and proposed amendments to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILKINSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WADE. I hope not.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 28, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. J. ALLEN MAXWELL, of South Orange, New Jersey.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved. The SPEAKER. By the order of the House yesterday this day was set apart by unanimous consent for debate on the constitutional amendment, and no other business can be transacted. The Chair, however, does not suppose that that order was meant to preclude the receiving of reports from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, as it is necessary for the bills to be sent to the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 94) for the relief of Isaac R. Diller;

An act (H. R. No. 394) for the relief of Mary Scales Accardi.

An act (H. R. No. 622) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company, in the District of Columbia," approved July 1, 1864;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 99) reserving mineral lands from the operation of all acts passed at the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress granting lands or extending the time of former grants; and

An act (S. No. 363) to amend the charter of the Washington Gas-Light Company.

SERVICE ON COMMITTEE.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I rise to a privileged question. Some days ago I was appointed on a committee of investigation. I have delayed asking to be excused, because I really hoped that I should be able to attend to the duty. But I have so many things accumulating on my hands in consequence of sickness for two weeks during this session, that I find it impossible to act on that committee, at any rate to act properly. I therefore ask to be excused.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that question must be reserved until after the morning hour on Monday next, as it requires a vote of the House. If the gentleman will call the attention of the Chair to it after the morning hour on Monday next, his request will be submitted to the House.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House, at its last session, rejected the joint resolution (S. No. 16) submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to prohibit slavery in the several States; upon which Mr. Brown, of Wisconsin, was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. When I obtained the floor upon the close of the debate when this subject was last under consideration, it was with the expectation of opening the discussion on Tuesday next, to which day this subject had been postponed. I desire to ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to follow the speaker who may close the discussion to-day, and be entitled to the floor when the consideration of this subject shall be resumed on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Brown] asks permission to waive his right to the floor to-day, and that he shall be considered entitled to it on Tuesday next. Is there any objection?

Mr. ASHLEY. How long will the gentleman desire on Tuesday?

Mr. BROWN. Probably not more than fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. ASHLEY. I have no objection to the gentleman having twenty or twenty-five minutes on Tuesday, instead of addressing the House to-day.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I shall not occupy more time than that.

Mr. STILES. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] if he proposes to press the question to a vote on Tuesday next.

Mr. ASHLEY. That is my present intention.

Mr. HIGBY. I had supposed that I should immediately follow the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Brown] in this debate. That was one reason why, on the day that he obtained the floor, I moved the adjournment; in order that he might have a full opportunity to be heard when the question should come up again, and that I might immediately follow him. But he has obtained leave, by unanimous consent, to speak on Tuesday next, the day when the question is to come up again.

Mr. STEVENS. When was that unanimous consent granted?

Mr. HIGBY. Just a few moments ago.

Mr. STEVENS. I was not present when that was done, or I should have objected. I would ask if that unanimous consent could properly be given to-day, or if anything can be done to-day but speaking.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would have doubted that the arrangement could properly be made, had any gentleman objected. But it was a mere question as to the time when the gentleman should speak, he being already entitled to the floor. Still the arrangement required unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENS. I had supposed that the vote was to be taken on Tuesday next. I must object to any speaking that will carry the subject beyond that day.

Mr. ASHLEY. I do not think we should disregard the agreement of the House that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Brown] shall be allowed to occupy twenty minutes on next Tuesday. I understand that is all the time he desires.

The SPEAKER. Although no entry will be made on the Journal, the Chair will feel bound to recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Brown] as entitled to the floor, if he claims it on Tuesday next, after the one who shall have obtained it at the time of the adjournment to-day shall have concluded his remarks.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, amid the long debate that has occurred upon this question, not only at the last session but also at this session, three classes of objections principally have been raised upon the other side of the House. One of them is that the Constitution of the United States contains no provision by which we can make an amendment of the character proposed in the resolution now before the House; another, joined with the objection I have just named, is that it is inexpedient at this time to make this amendment; and the third objection is, that slavery is the true condition of the African race.

Mr. Speaker, objections of this kind are the only ones which at this time men could possibly raise to the passage of this resolution. The first of these statements savors of the argument which has been used for scores of years, that the States were complete sovereignties when they organized the General Government. The proposition is very simple, very direct. It is a matter of fact in history that the States never were separate and independent. As dependent colonies, they united together for the purpose of gaining their independence and securing a separation from the mother country. They were dependent colonies at that time, but through their union and their united action independence was obtained. And having obtained their independence, the very first action on their part was to establish a constitution for a General Government over all.

They established a Government under the Articles of Confederation, which, for the sake of distinction from the present Constitution, I will designate as the former Constitution. When they had established that Government, there was no State government that could exist for any time except by virtue of the Confederation. When they had continued under that form of government until they found that it would not accomplish its ends and objects, they established the present Constitution; and it was established for the purpose of common defense, for the purpose of giving to the States under that General Government such local powers as the General Government saw fit to give; and they could not exist as separate and independent States except by virtue of the General Government which the people established. Under that Government, the States could have no separate, independent sovereignty.

Now, sir, two of the Articles of Confederation explain the object of the establishment of that form of government. The third article contains virtually the preamble; it declares the objects and the purposes of establishing that Constitution. It reads thus:

"The said States hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other, for their common defense, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, binding themselves to assist each other against all force offered to, or attacks made upon them or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretense whatever."

In this article is embraced a declaration of the objects and purposes for which this Government was established; and it was under this as the Government of the United States that each State had whatever local government it could possess secured to it.

But, sir, in order to understand the full object and intent of that form of government, it is necessary to read the last or thirteenth article:

"Every State shall abide by the determination of the United States in Congress assembled on all questions which by this Confederation is submitted to them; and the Articles of this Confederation shall be inviolably observed by every State, and the Union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them, unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterward confirmed by the Legislatures of every State."

It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that this article corresponds with one portion of what we find in the preamble of the present Constitution:

"The Articles of this Confederation shall be inviolably observed by every State, and the Union shall be perpetual."

Now, sir, the third article which I have read and this last one embrace all the objects and purposes for which this first Constitution was established, "for their common defense, the security of their liberties," and to make a Union that should be perpetual.

This instrument was used for a few years as the one through which the General Government was operated. But, sir, it was found to be weak and imbecile; it was found that there was not power enough at the center, and that the vitality at the extremities was so great that the danger was the breaking up of the Union and the defeat of the objects for which the Government was organized. A convention was called, delegates being sent from various States of the Union; and the result of the work of that convention was to give us the present Constitution under which we are operating our Government. Now, sir, let us see how long the rule which was prescribed for the amendment of the Articles of Confederation was regarded by the men who established that form of government when it had been found that it did not secure the great objects for which it was created, and how long a constitution was allowed to stand in the way of preserving the Union and securing the liberties of the people.

The result of that convention was the Constitution which we now have, with the exception of the twelve articles which have since been added as amendments. What is very singular, is that the last article of the present Constitution reads thus:

"The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same."

That article of the Constitution is in complete violation of the last article of the first Constitution, which required that any amendment should be sanctioned by every State in the Union before it became a part of the Constitution; but under this article of the present Constitution, when nine States had ratified it, it should be established as the Government of those nine States.

What was the object of establishing this new Constitution? Now, sir, there is something a little singular, something marked, something that is worthy of attention, that had reference to the Articles of Confederation. The States united in making them, while the preamble to the present Constitution declares that—

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, &c., do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

The Articles of Confederation declared that the Union should be perpetual, but when they who established it found that it would not answer, they framed another Constitution, and announced their purpose in the preamble. The preamble declared that "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." It was to establish a more perfect union than the original one. The Articles of Confederation could not stand in the way of the accomplishment of these declared purposes. The old frame of government was swept away, and another was substituted in its place. That was in entire violation of the original instrument. The liberties of the people made it necessary, and the matter could not be referred to the people except by pursuing such a course.

It is said, sir, in this House that the Constitution cannot be amended in the manner proposed in this resolution and in regard to the subject-matter embraced, notwithstanding the Constitution provides the mode and method by which it may be amended. There is but one method provided for amendment. It is the mode attempted by this joint resolution. The Constitution provides that a two-thirds vote of both branches of Congress shall be required to pass a proposition for amendment; and it is further provided that it must be ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States before it shall become a part of the Constitution of the United States. It is the method now adopted in the proposed amendment.

I lay down this proposition, sir, that when the States ratified the Constitution they yielded and subscribed to all the provisions of that instrument, among which provisions is the method by which the Constitution could be amended. What does a State subscribe to when it ratifies the Constitution? It subscribes to the objects and purposes declared in the preamble. It subscribes to what is contained in the first article. It subscribes to every article in that instrument, and among others it subscribes to the one which provides for an amendment to the Constitution. There is no exception. I say that whenever the States finally ratified the Constitution they subscribed to the provision by which that Constitution could be amended.

But, sir, the objection is raised that certain articles of the Constitution prescribe the powers that are granted to the General Government and the rights reserved to the States, and which are not granted to the General Government. I ask the gentlemen who raise this objection where in the Constitution they find it. They do not find it anywhere in the first seven articles of the Constitution adopted by the Convention and ratified by the States. They do not find it there, but they say that we will find it among the amendments. I turn to them and find certain rights are reserved—articles nine and ten are the ones they refer to.

Article nine provides that "the enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people;" and article ten provides that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." Here is where they find ground for their argument. Mr. Speaker, until these amendments were added to the Constitution there were no rights reserved to the States. I do not think that will be disputed.

Now, sir, where did these amendments originate? If they have not come to the Constitution by virtue of this power of amendment they do not belong to it. If any rights have been reserved to the States they have been reserved by these express words of the Constitution, and these express words are given to the Constitution by a two-thirds vote of the House and Senate, and by the ratification of the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, and these are simple amendments of the Constitution by the method which the Constitution proposes, and by pursuing precisely the same process we are trying to pursue in order to make this amendment.

Again, sir, is it pretended that anywhere in the Constitution it has been expressed that it requires the assent of every State to an amendment, or that we are required to pursue any other course than the one that is prescribed and expressed? These amendments have been made by this same process; and in those amendments it is not declared that to take away any one of these rights will require the assent of every State of the Union. These amendments have not attempted to amend that portion of the Constitution which instructs us how amendments shall be made, but simply express and declare the reservation of those rights to the States or peoples of the States not enumerated in the powers granted; and, sir, whatever a two-thirds vote in Congress has proposed, and the ratification of the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States have added to the Constitution, a two-thirds vote of Congress and a ratification of three-fourths of the States can take away. And will it be pretended that there is not the same power, and by precisely the same process, to remove from the Constitution articles nine and ten?

And if that be true it is in the power of Congress and of these States, by precisely the same process, indirectly to reach any question which might be the annihilation of any portion of the Constitution, under the same process. I will, Mr. Speaker, suppose for a moment, for the sake of argument, that we have no power under the Constitution to propose in this body, to be ratified by three-fourths of the States, an amendment taking from the States any one of the rights reserved. I suppose that for the sake of the argument, and for the purpose of presenting another point, and under that supposition I will submit to members this question: what are rights reserved? The preamble of the Constitution declares certain purposes for which the Government is established. The States and the people of the States have given in their adhesion to that instrument, and they have united together for that purpose. Now, sir, what are rights reserved? Are they rights to establish institutions or to do anything by their local governments that should destroy the force and effect of the powers granted? Or are the rights reserved those only which would aid to carry out the objects and purposes of the General Government itself? Why, sir, the commander of an army who divides his forces and sends a portion of them against the enemy does not keep his reserves back to war against those he has sent in advance. They all go to the aid and support of the portion sent in advance provided the enemy is too much for those in front, and when the commander, with practiced eye, observes that it is necessary for the reserves to go forward, they go forward to the same kind of work that those are engaged in advance. Those in advance and the reserve both cower and do battle together for one common object, the conquest of their common enemy.

Rights reserved! Why, just look at these amendments which have already been made, and you will find that they were all for the purpose of securing liberties to the people, and not for the purpose of giving to them power of oppression and despotism. Rights were reserved, fearing that the General Government might be too strong or too weak; if too strong, that it might trample under foot the liberties of the people, might establish despotism; rights were reserved, if it proved too weak, for the purpose of keeping vitality in the General Government, that it should be administered for the purpose of securing liberties to the people, insuring domestic tranquillity, providing for the common defense, and promoting the general welfare. Reserved rights! Were any rights reserved that any State should nourish within itself institutions of any character which should create turmoil, tumult, war, and bloodshed throughout the whole land? Why, sir, one of the very objects for which this Constitution was established is being violated by an institution cherished by State governments. It has been the sole cause of the four years' rebellion and war, and we are told that we have no power to amend the Constitution, to aid in getting rid of the evil.

If such was the case we might as well surrender and say that we have no Government at all, because this institution which we are taking steps according to the Constitution to remove is the very one which lies at the foundation of the whole struggle, bloodshed, distress, and desolation, which have prevailed all over the land for the last four years. We have a practical illustration. When the Constitution is turned to for the purpose of showing a limitation of time within which certain subjects should not be interfered with, we find that up to 1808 it was claimed that the States could employ themselves in the slave trade; but after that time Congress could legislate, without any amendment of the Constitution, and prohibit it. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that it was believed by the framers of the Constitution that when Congress could reach the question it would put an effectual stop to the slave trade, and that that would be the end of the institution itself.

The slave trade was a constant feeder of the institution until that time. It was supposed that it must have this great source of supply or it would become exhausted and wear itself out; and no doubt such was the logic that influenced the minds of the men who framed the Constitution, that when Congress could reach it by its power after the year 1808, it would deal an effectual blow to slavery, and that it would finally become extinct. But with the great experience that they had, there has been the experience of years since, and such an experience as shows that instead of its wasting away, even with the checks that this Government could put upon that trade, slavery has been increasing with great rapidity, and slaves have increased in number faster in proportion than the white population of the country. That, therefore, would destroy the proposition they advocated and the conclusion to which they came. I have no doubt if they could only have looked into the future and seen the results as time has developed them, they would have made a provision in that instrument by which Congress could have exercised control over the institution of slavery for its ultimate extinction.

To my mind there is no question, not the least, in relation to our power. We have the power. This cannot be a right reserved to the States. When we see the evil which it generates, when we see its effect upon the welfare of the country, when we see how much of internal commotion and turmoil it has occasioned, we must see at once that it is a disturbing, a destructive element everywhere; not only in the States where it exists, but in the States where it does not exist. It affects the general interests of the entire country and the nation. There is no domestic tranquillity now, and there never will be while this institution remains in the land.

This question of expediency it seems to me is but a mountain of frost which an hour's sun will entirely annihilate. There never was a time when the expediency was so great. Expediency or in-expediency does not enter into this question for a moment. Now is the time, this session of Congress, as speedily as we can act, for us to pass this measure, and then State after State will take it up and act upon and ratify it.

And in conclusion, for I do not propose to occupy the time of the House much longer, I will venture the assertion that if this resolution passes this body by a two-thirds vote, some State that either now has, or within the last four years had, this institution of slavery within its borders, will be one of the first and the swiftest to ratify this amendment to the Constitution, and if their Legislatures can meet we will find State after State doing the same, and if those in rebellion should lay down their arms, and ask to be allowed to come back into the Union, they will come with constitutions remodeled, and with this amendment ratified along with their constitutions. And we would get more than a three-fourths vote, even in the fifteen slave States. The revolution in public sentiment is going forward, and as those States come, one after another, and knock at the door of Congress and ask that their Representatives be again admitted upon this floor, they will come with free constitutions, and will accept this proposition as it goes from Congress, and will cheerfully ratify it. They will accept the terms joyfully, as contributing to their domestic happiness and prosperity, as well as to the national welfare.

We find the most strenuous opposition to this measure coming from free States. The Representatives from free States are the most urgent and vehement in their opposition to this proposition. What a sad picture is thus presented. While the great mass of those who come here from the slave States are asking that this great boon be given them, and that they may be enabled to get rid of an institution which presses upon them directly, and indirectly upon every State in the Union, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] is taking still stronger ground, and in advance of others who oppose this proposition. His position, among others, is that the true condition of the African race is slavery. He is one of the Representatives of a State that has over four million inhabitants.

Now, let us see what his State has to say against the proposition that he lays down here. I read from the constitution of the State of New York—mark the language. Section one of article two of that constitution is as follows:

"Every male citizen of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a citizen for ten days, and an inhabitant of this State one year next preceding an election, and for the last four months a resident of the county where he may offer to vote, shall be entitled to vote at such election, in the election district of which he shall at that time be a resident, and not elsewhere, for all officers that now are, or hereafter may be elective by the people; but such citizen shall have been for thirty days next preceding the election a resident of the district from which the officer is to be chosen for whom he offers to vote. But no man of color, unless he shall have been for three years a citizen of this State, and for one year next preceding any election shall have been seized and possessed of a freehold estate of the value of $250, over and above all debts and incumbrances charged thereon, and shall have been actually rated and paid a tax thereon, shall be entitled to vote at such election, and no person of color shall be subject to direct taxation unless he shall be seized and possessed of such real estate as aforesaid."

Now, if the true condition of the African race is slavery, the great population of New York, in its sentiment and in its action, in the establishment of its organic law, must have been insane, for they provided by their constitution that the colored man of the age of twenty-one, and possessed of a freehold estate of the value of $250 over and above all indebtedness, and who should have been a resident of the State for three years, shall be entitled to a vote.

Will that gentleman or any other say that a slave ought to go to the polls and vote? Will he pretend to say that the true condition of that man who does go to the polls and vote is slavery? If he does, he stands alone in his declaration; and all I can admire in the man is his boldness and firmness in supporting a proposition that so palpably outrages humanity.

Mr. Speaker, but one wish possesses me in regard to this subject: it is that this resolution may pass. I hope that the obstacles which have been raised by members upon the other side of the House will in their own minds melt away, and that they will realize the true condition of the country and see that the only way to restore the peace that the country needs is to pass this resolution and submit it to the action of the Legislatures of the several States. I have no doubt as to the conclusion at which the States will arrive. I feel confident that we shall have the ratification of at least three-fourths, if not more, and thus settle forever a question that has caused so much painful anxiety to every lover of his country.

Mr. CRAVENS. Mr. Speaker, I have been requested by my colleague, Mr. VOORHEES, to say that he is still detained from his seat by the sickness of his wife, who has been dangerously ill.

Mr. COX. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. McKINNEY, is detained at home by a death in his family.

Mr. FINCK. Mr. Speaker, the resolution under consideration has been discussed so fully that I shall content myself with stating very briefly some of the reasons why I shall vote against its passage. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to enter into any discussion with regard to the power of Congress to pass this resolution, or of three-fourths of the States to ratify it as an amendment to the Constitution. Sir, there are considerations outside of the mere question of power which will control my action. It seems to me that gentlemen have mistaken the true issue involved when they argue that opposition to this resolution is to favor slavery. Sir, I know that for myself I am not the friend or advocate of slavery. I know that the Democratic party of the North is not now and has never been a pro-slavery party. In a speech which I delivered on this floor at the last session, I took occasion to say that "I do not defend slavery. I am not its advocate or friend. I have no interest whatever in the institution. If it must die, as the legitimate result of the organization of the rebellion, let it perish." I repeat that to-day.

This is not a question whether slavery is right or wrong. It is not a question whether slavery ought to be continued or abolished; but it involves the question whether we are willing to surrender to the Federal Government the power to interfere with and regulate the domestic affairs of the States. I will not consent to aggregate new powers in the hands of the Federal Government at the sacrifice of the States. This proposition rises to such importance, that in my judgment, if in a time of profound peace it was adopted, and attempted to be enforced by three-fourths of the States against the protest of the remaining one-fourth, it would produce war; and if this be true, how unwise is it now, when we are engaged in this most unfortunate war growing out of sectional rivalries and prejudices, to add this new element of discord to the strife.

Sir, the commotions always attendant on civil war and revolution are not adapted to that calm and deliberate thought and investigation so necessary in making changes in the fundamental laws of a nation. In times like these, unfortunately, men are more apt to take counsel of their passions than of the true glory and welfare of the Republic. I believe the adoption of this amendment will postpone peace, and obstruct the return of the States to the Union. It will intensify the strife, and add new troubles to the adjustment of questions, which sooner or later must be committed to the hands of peaceful negotiation.

There was no question discussed in the Convention which framed the Constitution more carefully considered than that of the division of powers between the States and the Federal Government. It was upon this great question that parties in the Convention were organized, and the plans proposed in that Convention, giving to the General Government the power to supervise and control the legislation of the States, were rejected by a large majority. The Convention was firmly opposed to a strong national Government, and in favor of a Government with limited and well-defined, specific powers, with a reservation to the States and people of all the powers not delegated. And an examination of the proceedings of the several conventions of the States called to ratify the Constitution, will show how anxious the people were to guard the reserved powers of the States from any invasion by the Federal Government, and that they insisted on an amendment which declares that—

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Gentlemen in this discussion have seen proper to denounce what is denominated "State rights." I do not precisely understand what they mean by this course of argument. If it is meant that the States have no right to secede and destroy the Union, I will agree with them in that, because I deny the existence of any such right. But if it is meant that the States do not possess certain well-defined and understood reserved powers, which are sovereign in their character, and which cannot be invaded or subordinated by the Federal Government, then I take issue with them. The United States, under the powers delegated to it by the Constitution, is supreme in the exercise of all powers thus delegated. The Constitution is the life of the Federal Government; it cannot exist without it, and outside of that instrument enjoys no powers. Within the powers delegated to it by the Constitution it is supreme; but the States are also supreme in all their reserved powers. Both the Federal and State Governments are supreme each in their own respective and constitutional sphere. Does any gentleman controvert this proposition? Even Alexander Hamilton, the ablest and strongest advocate of centralized power, admits this much. In a speech which he delivered in the New York convention he said:

"The laws of the United States are supreme as to all their proper constitutional objects. The laws of the States are supreme in the same way. Suppose both Governments lay a tax of a penny on an article; had not each an uncontrollable power to collect its own tax? The meaning of the maxim, there cannot be two supremes, is simply this—two powers cannot be supreme over each other."

And, speaking further on the same subject, he says:

"I maintain that the word supreme imports no more than this, that the Constitution, and laws made in pursuance thereof, cannot be controlled or defeated by any other law. The acts of the United States, therefore, will be absolutely obligatory as to all proper objects and powers of the General Government. The States, as well as individuals, are bound by these laws; but the laws of Congress are restricted to a certain sphere; and when they depart from this sphere they are no longer supreme or binding. In the same manner the States have certain independent powers in which their laws are supreme. For example, in the making and executing laws concerning the punishment of certain crimes, such as murder, theft, &c., the States cannot be controlled. With respect to certain other objects, the powers of the two Governments are concurrent and yet supreme."

I understood my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] to say, in his speech on this subject, that the sovereignty of the American people came down in regular succession from the British Crown, and he gave its "genealogy" thus:

"First the Crown and Parliament of Great Britain; second the revolutionary Congress; third the Articles of Confederation; and fourth and now, the Constitution of the United States."

I have been taught a different doctrine. I have been taught that sovereignty in the temporal order is derived through and ascends from the people.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FINCK. Certainly, with great pleasure.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think I understood my friend to charge me with having traced sovereignty down from the Crown to the people. I said that the people withdrew their sovereignty from the Crown to themselves, and then lodged it in the revolutionary Congress. I maintained all the while, in my argument, that the people were the source of power.

Mr. FINCK. I am very glad to know that my friend and colleague has explained this matter. I understood from his speech that he assumed a different position. I am glad that he concurs with me in the principle that sovereignty inheres in the people.

Our fathers believed the division of powers which they provided between the States and the Federal Government to be essential to our free system of government. I concur in that opinion, and am therefore unwilling to invest the Federal Government with an additional power, to enable it to control the internal and domestic concerns of the States. I am opposed, sir, to the centralization of power in the hands of the Federal Government. This is one of the dangers which now threatens to disturb, if not overthrow, our system of government. I would not make this invasion either to establish or abolish slavery. These are questions peculiarly and exclusively belonging to the States, and we may rest assured that they will dispose of them to suit themselves. Maryland has already done so; Missouri has done the same thing, and Kentucky is about to organize a plan for the accomplishment of the same object. But, sir, as a citizen of Ohio, and a Representative from that State on this floor, I have no desire to interfere with the action of the people of Kentucky in disposing of the question of slavery to suit themselves. All candid men must admit that State action will be the most satisfactory plan of settling the question, and cannot disturb the amicable relations which should exist between the several States, while the effect of adding the proposed amendment to the Constitution, will tend to disturb the harmony of the States, and embitter and further prolong this unfortunate war.

Is it possible that this amendment can aid in subduing the rebellion and restoring the Union? I cannot agree with gentlemen who have argued that it will. Gentlemen, instead of adhering to the original declarations made at the commencement of this war, have entirely changed their purposes, and now propose plans of reconstruction and readmission of States, on such terms and conditions as can only result in protracting the struggle. Sir, I am glad to know that one of the ablest generals of the age, one who has so recently added new luster to our arms in his victorious and triumphant march through Georgia, and in the capture of Savannah, has enunciated to the people of that State some views which seem to me eminently proper and patriotic. In a letter written by General Sherman on the 8th instant, he says:

"Georgia is not out of the Union, and therefore the talk of reconstruction appears to me inappropriate. Some of the people have been and still are in a state of revolution, and as long as they remain armed and organized, the United States must pursue them with armies and deal with them according to military law. But as soon as they break up their armed organizations and return to their homes, I take it they will be dealt with by the civil courts. Some of the rebels in Georgia, in my judgment, deserve death, because they have committed murder and other crimes which are punished with death by all civilized Governments on earth." * * * "Whenever the people of Georgia quit rebelling against their Government and elect members of Congress and Senators, and these go and take their seats, then the State of Georgia will have resumed her functions in the Union."

Sir, if this Administration had borne high in the face of heaven and the American people the broad banner of the Constitution, inscribed upon it, "The Constitution and the Union, these must be preserved at all hazards; these are our terms of peace; we ask no other;" this war, in my humble judgment, would have long since terminated. But other principles and another policy have prevailed, and still prevail, which add new obstacles to the suppression of the rebellion, and tend to prolong the war. We started out on the theory of compelling those who had combined to break up the Union to obey the constitutional authority of the United States. We had the right to do that, and our strength was in adhering to that single purpose, to require obedience to the Constitution by the people of every section of the country.

In this hour, when our arms have been victorious in Georgia, in Tennessee, and in North Carolina; when the victory of General Sherman is followed up by him by such prudent conduct as to arouse and strengthen the Union sentiment of the people of Georgia, it becomes us to adopt a wise and patriotic policy, and endeavor by honorable conciliation to aid our armies in convincing the people of the insurgent States that only under the old Constitution, which was the work of their fathers as well as ours, can they be secure, and that such security cannot be had under Jefferson Davis. It seems to me that in this period of our history, at this very time, we need the highest order of statesmanship—a statesmanship that shall not be controlled by the mad passions of the hour, but one which shall employ every power consistent with the true honor and interests of the country, to stay the further effusion of blood, and restore peace to our beloved land.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment the policy of this Administration has failed very much in coming up to the true requirements of the times. It seems unfortunate for the interests of the country that the Republican party is so organized—and I do not wish to say this in any partisan or unkind feeling—that it is not adapted to the administration of a great Government like ours. Instead of endeavoring to conform and harmonize itself and its doctrines to the Constitution of the country, it seems only capable of working out its destiny by making the Constitution conform to its sectional and unwise policy. It has shown itself utterly incapable of administering a Government like this, composed of States with different local institutions, and therefore, in order to perpetuate its own existence, it has determined to obtain the power to regulate the domestic concerns of the States, and to mold them to suit its own purposes. I beseech gentlemen not to be controlled by mere sentiment, but looking back over the history of the great and good men who framed our Government, and remembering the happy adjustment of powers which they provided, to unite with us in preserving this Constitution as it came to us from the hands of the fathers.

I do not think it would be inappropriate here to refer to the opinions of a statesman who has been honored by the American people; who was formerly a member of this House, and then of the Senate; who held distinguished positions in this country and abroad in Europe. I refer to Edward Everett, whose death the country has been called on so recently to deplore. Speaking on the subject of amending the Constitution, he has uttered words which seem to me words of wisdom. I trust that both sides of the House will give attention while I read a few extracts from his speech made in the House of Representatives in March, 1826. He says:

"In my judgment the very worst possible remedy for any evil not positively intolerable in this country is an amendment to the Constitution. It is an acknowledged maxim of political prudence that frequent changes of the laws, even in matters of ordinary legislation, are pernicious. It is the opinion of every sound statesman that it is far better to bear with any evil that is not absolutely intolerable than to render the great interests of the country insecure by indecisive and fluctuating legislation."

Further on, in speaking of the Constitution, he says:

"Sir, I do not think it perfect; but it is good enough for me. I have lived under other political institutions; nearly a third of my life since I came to years of discretion has been passed under other forms of government, and I have learned enough of the state of foreign societies, and enough of the political condition of the great majority of this race of man, to be well contented with what Providence has given us in the Constitution of the United States. I am contented to live by it, contented when I die to leave my children in its safeguard, and I would sooner lay down this right hand to be cut off than I would hold it up to vote for any essential change in this form of government."

It has been said during this debate that slavery will perish as one of the results of this war, and that it would do so without congressional action. I do not propose to controvert this proposition; but, sir, to hasten its destruction I am unwilling to aggregate new powers in the hand of the Federal Government.

There is one thing which should not be forgotten, and which is beyond controversy. It is that the framers of the Constitution would not confer on Congress, the power to regulate the internal and domestic policy of the States.

Another significant fact should also be remembered—that all the amendments which have been made to the Constitution are amendments which further limit the powers of the Federal Government, or more clearly define them. No amendment has, in the whole history of the Constitution, been made which increased the powers of the Federal Government, in derogation of the rights of the States; and I trust we shall not be the first to depart from this wise policy.

Mr. Speaker, let the questions of amendment be postponed until the rebellion is suppressed and the Union restored; and then, when peace shall once more bless the American people, if it shall be found necessary to make amendments, it will be time to propose and consider them; but, for the present, let your propositions of amendment and schemes of reconstruction be delayed.

I therefore, Mr. Speaker, oppose this resolution, because it will not tend to suppress the rebellion and restore the Union, but will protract the war. I oppose it because it is in conflict with the settled policy of our system of government, and the uninterrupted and uniform sanction of the American people, which has recognized the right of each State to regulate its own internal and domestic policy; and because I am unwilling to disturb the wise division of powers which our fathers adjusted between the States and the Federal Government.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to make any speech upon the subject before the House. I have no occasion to define my position on that question or questions kindred to it. But in connection with the remarks which have just fallen from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] in opposition to the passage of this constitutional amendment, I desire to say that he differs radically from distinguished gentlemen of my State of his own party. The Legislature of Illinois is now in session, and resolutions have just been before it instructing our Senators and requesting our members of Congress to vote for the passage of this constitutional amendment. In the Senate there was a very able and elaborate discussion upon the subject, and out of eleven of the Democratic members of that body only five voted against the resolutions of instruction.

Three of these Democratic Senators made speeches in favor of the resolutions of instruction. Hon. Murray McConnell, of the Morgan district, one of the oldest and ablest Democrats in the State, and known as the "war-horse of Democracy of Illinois," made a bold and able speech in favor of the resolutions—a speech which will be considered as the crowning act of a long and eventful life, nearly all of which has been spent in Illinois, for I believe he has resided in the State ever since it became a State; and he has ever been one of the firmest and strictest Democrats we ever had in the State. The other Democrats who made speeches for the resolutions of instruction were Messrs. Scofield, of Hancock county, a brother of the distinguished member of our House of that name, but different politics, and Mr. Lindsey, of Peoria county, in the congressional district of my colleague, Mr. INGERSOLL. A tribute of respect is due to all these Democratic gentlemen in our Legislature who declared by speech or vote their determination to permit the people of the United States to amend the Constitution, to wipe out the institution of slavery, so wicked and infernal in itself, and which has brought such untold horrors upon the nation.

Mr. COLE, of California. Mr. Speaker, the dominion of force is giving way to reason. The rightful relations of men to each other are being understood and acknowledged. Mutual reliance is a law of civil society, and there is no such thing as absolute independence among men. Whatever is beneficial to a portion, says the political philosopher, is beneficial to the whole community; and whatever is injurious to a portion is injurious to the whole. Every individual is therefore interested in the welfare of every other individual, and this without limitation or qualification. The obligation to render justice is as wide as the universe, and neither nation nor individual can override it with impunity. This rule has been recognized by the more enlightened Governments in their action upon the subject of slavery. Much has been done within the last century to destroy this acknowledged evil, and the United States has not lagged behind in the work. She was the first to discard distinctions of blood, which all history proves to have been fruitful of oppression. She was the first to proclaim to the world the inalienable character of the right to liberty, and this in the face of powerful opposing interests. She was the first, also, to pronounce the trade in slaves upon the high seas to be piracy. Boldly taking the lead of older nations, and while yet in her infancy, like Hercules, she strangled white slavery in the Barbary States. She planted colonies on the coast of Africa in the very paths of slavery and the slave trade. The example she has presented of popular government has shaken the foundation of every throne in existence. She has done far more than other nations to undermine oppression everywhere, and is doing more to-day than all of them combined. She had greater obstacles to overcome in the performance of this high duty, but she hesitated not to grapple with tyranny in all its Protean shapes; and, by the favor of God, single-handed and alone, if need be, she will utterly destroy it from the face of the earth. Whatever other nations may have done against slavery has been done under the constraint of the example set them by the United States of America. The grand old monarchies of Europe have followed, not led, in this matter. Their course in our present, and it is to be hoped final, struggle shows that their sympathies are with the oppressor. But justice will triumph, freedom prevail, and liberty, exalted in this proud capital, will exert its proper sway over the whole world and for all time.

Other views of this question have been fully and ably discussed already. I only wished to vindicate our national reputation in this regard against the too often repeated aspersions of foreigners. I am done.

Mr. STARR. Mr. Speaker, after the lengthy and thorough discussion of the question before the House by the many able gentlemen who have preceded me, an humble individual like myself cannot hope to say much with reference thereto that will be new, neither can I expect to influence the opinions of any gentleman upon the floor of this House upon this important subject. It is therefore with neither of these expectations that I shall occupy the time of the House, but rather that I may, in as brief a manner as possible, set forth some of the reasons that influence me in the vote I shall cast when the question is put to the members of this House for their decision.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I shall not attempt to discuss the constitutionality of the proposed measure of amending the Constitution. That, in my judgment, has been most ably and thoroughly discussed already, and it would indeed be a great presumption for me to attempt it. I am, however, quite willing to say, that if the people of the United States have the power to amend the Constitution as proposed, then we are proceeding in the proper manner to enable them to exercise that power if they choose to do so; that they should have the opportunity to determine for themselves whether or not they desire such amendment, and that I envy not the man who, professing to represent a free people, is at the same time unwilling to accept their judgment upon the institutions of the Government.

And just here, Mr. Speaker, allow me to say, that in my judgment it is not a question of vital importance, in considering the adoption of these resolutions, whether or not the people have the right to amend the Constitution as proposed. That is a question to be settled by the Supreme Court of the United States—rather let us, therefore, submit the proposed amendments to the people for their action, and then the friends of slavery can have that issue tried before the only tribunal that can authoritatively determine it. And there also can they try that other point upon which my colleague [Mr. ROGERS] seemed to lay so much stress when he said—

"You must remember that it is proposed by this amendment that the States in which slavery exists shall have no vote, because they are not in a position to exercise the right to vote upon this question. But it is proposed that three fourths of the States—States wherein slavery does not exist; States which have no interest in that species of property—shall get together, and by the action of three fourths of them deprive of their property the citizens of the loyal border States."

Now, sir, by this statement of the intention of the movers of these proposed amendments, which, though not entirely correct, yet is perhaps as near so as he could make it; and by his objections thereto, I understand my colleague to assert that the power to amend requires the concurrence, not only of three fourths of the States represented in the Government at the present time, but three fourths of the entire number of States which composed this Government at the time of the breaking out of the rebellion. This issue can also be tried at the same time by the Supreme Court and a decision rendered upon both. And yet, Mr. Speaker, I am at a loss to discover any disadvantage in this particular respect my colleague, or rather those rebellious States for whose rights and interests he displays so much anxiety, will experience by their "not being in a condition to exercise their right to vote," as he calls it, but which really means being in rebellion; even though it should be decided by the Supreme Court that they must be included in estimating the number required for approval of amendments, inasmuch as their participation in the vote upon the amendments could make no difference in the result, unless some of them voted in favor thereof, and consequently aided in doing that thing my colleague deprecates so much, "depriving the citizens of the loyal border States of their property"—property in slaves—an act which, by the way, these loyal border State men themselves seem very intent upon doing, and thus anticipating our action in reference thereto. Perhaps they do this out of regard for the feelings of my colleague; perhaps the fear that, owing to the opposition to the measure in this House, we shall not be able to secure the abolition of slavery throughout the nation may have induced these loyal border State men to abolish the institution in their States for themselves. I am, however, inclined to believe that they did it because they had realized the evil as well as the wrong of slavery; and that they determined to get rid of the institution and its inseparable evils at the earliest practicable moment.

But, sir, it is not necessary for me to attempt to explain why they have done this; it is done, and in nothing more than in this is exposed the false philanthropy of these northern conservators of slavery. These Pietists who, claiming that slavery is a divine institution protected by the Constitution, and best suited to the temporal and spiritual interests of both races, are told by these experienced men of the border States that it is a curse alike to whites and negroes, and that they will have it no more.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is one point in my colleague's remarks with which I can agree, and that is the patriotism of the loyal men of the border States; and in my judgment it shines out the brightest and best in this great tribute they have just paid to the cause of human liberty; for we see them, while suffering from the devastating effects of the war upon the soil of their States, setting us an example of sacrifice and duty that will be recorded in history with undying honor.

There is, however, another point in the remarks of my colleague, in which, if I understand him aright, we can never agree, and that is, that the States in rebellion, while in rebellion, must be included in estimating the number of States required for approval of amendments to the Constitution; that those States that have rebelled, separated themselves from, and attempted to destroy this Government, do nevertheless still hold within this Government, under the Constitution thereof, a controlling power with reference to making amendments thereto; that they, taking up the sword and bidding defiance to the Government and its military forces, do at the same time hold such rights under and within the Government they are seeking to destroy as to prevent the people of the United States, during the willful and determined absence of these rebels, and without their consent making any change in the Constitution itself. This, sir, is so gross a perversion of reason that I can never agree to it, and I therefore desire to submit it to the judgment of the people of the United States, and their courts, in order that right here, at this time, when this monstrous claim of the right of rebels to control, through the provisions of the Constitution, the legislation and courts of the Government they are seeking to destroy, may be met at once and settled forever.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief reference to the speech made by the gentleman from New York city, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD].

In his defense of the institution of slavery he cited the cruelties of the negro race in their native wilds as a justification for enslaving, or rather continuing the enslavement, of that portion of the same race who are living under the influences of Christianity and civilization. Now, I do not propose to discuss that proposition, it is too absurd for serious discussion, but I refer to it to commend to his enlightened wisdom and philanthropy the consideration of the disposition to be made of that people who so recently, in a locality with which he is so familiar, a locality claiming and possessing a high degree of Christianity and civilization, enacted scenes of cruelty and barbarism upon a civilized Christian people that rivaled anything he can find in stories of African travel.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, while I yield my convictions to the more experienced judgment of other gentlemen upon this floor with great deference upon most questions, I must be permitted still to entertain the opinion that debate upon the resolution before the House was, in the outset, injudicious. For it necessarily kindled party prejudices and feelings by fanning the embers of old issues destined soon to be buried beneath the ashes of civil war. But while I think it would have been better to have "given our thoughts no tongue," but simply a vote, yet, "being in," we must so conduct the discussion that our acts may not shame our words. If our Government were purely national, a majority of the people could amend the Constitution; if purely federal, it would require a concurrence of each State of the Union; but being a combination of both, a majority of the votes of the Legislatures or conventions of three fourths of the States was fixed upon by the framers of the Government as a compromise method of amendment. Here, I apprehend, is the cause of our divergence upon this overshadowing question. We take the one side or the other according as our reading and habits of thought have led us to give prominence to the federal or national element.

The bold and impressive speech of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENLETON], made a little time since, filled my mind with mingled regret and admiration. His treatment of the subject evinced not only unusual discipline and acquisitions, but extraordinary logical power. Clearly, sir, he has sat at the feet of the great South Carolinian till he has himself become a master, prepared not only to teach but to originate new refinements and to enlarge the body of subtle sophisms in that torrid and pestilent school of political philosophy. Admit the gentleman's premises, and you will reject his conclusions with difficulty. If our Union is simply a confederation of independent and sovereign States, and not a Government de facto; if it is only the agent of State governments, exercising for their convenience and advantage certain powers delegated by themselves, for specified ends, then clearly no change in the instrument into which such powers are framed can constitutionally be made as will enlarge or limit the legitimate scope and functions of the General Government by encroachments upon the reserved powers of the States. The high contracting parties would never have consented to conditions by which their agent might gradually absorb all their reserved rights and transform the confederacy into a centralized unity of Government. They would authorize amendments to the Constitution looking to the realization of the original purposes of the Government, but would not authorize any power to trench upon the reserved rights of an independent State. If the Union is wholly a compact, the gentleman is right, for the creature cannot claim of the creator or wrest from his grasp new powers by virtue of the limited powers which have been bestowed upon it; for if this were possible, it might by gradual encroachments, through factious combinations, ultimately absorb all power into itself and annihilate the very sources of its being.

Assuming that the States had an independent existence and an unlimited sovereignty previous to the foundation of the General Government, and that the General Government rests upon certain powers voluntarily surrendered for the purpose of securing the objects specified in the preamble to the Constitution, it will follow as an unavoidable sequence that neither three fourths nor any number of States can constitutionally take from a State any part of the independence and sovereignty not voluntarily surrendered up.

If, on this theory, the right to amend the Constitution given to three fourths of the States covers that reserve of powers, then it follows that three fourths of the States have the right to establish slavery, an autocracy, or idolatry in New Hampshire, against the will and the moral convictions of every citizen of the State, and in violation of her sovereignty.

If the gentleman's theory is correct, there can be no treason of individuals against the General Government, for States only and not individuals owe allegiance to that Government; and as States cannot be imprisoned or executed, not only does the language of the Constitution become meaningless and absurd, but the fatal crime itself shirks the retribution which the voice of humanity and outraged justice demand.

Davis and Lee, et omne genus, are not traitors, but patriots, fulfilling the highest and most sacred duty of loyalty to the only government to which, as citizens, their allegiance is due, and we are constrained to pay them, not only a meed of praise, but a tribute of heartfelt respect, for the dangers they have encountered and the sacrifices they have made in the terrible struggle through which they are passing for the defense of the rights of sovereign States. In a word, sir, in the masterly sectional debates which for a quarter of a century rang out from these halls of national council, in the great political struggles of the past and in the present bloody arbitrament of arms, the South have been right and the North wrong. If the Government is a league of sovereignties, subordinate to the States, and holding in trust at their will a few delegated powers, secession is a right, and the Union but a gilded bow upon the political atmosphere, without substance or reality, and ready to perish in our gaze on the slightest movement of insensible forces; and we who sit here are clothed with none of the attributes of nationality, but represent independent Governments, whose interests are liable to fall into an irreconcilable antagonism, with no regnant head to harmonize the discordant elements.

Sir, I commend the gentleman's logic. I admire his fearless advocacy of his principles. I am touched by the pathos and classic beauty of his eloquence, but I utterly repudiate his political creed as destitute of any historic basis, and destructive of good government and civil liberty.

Our national Government was revolutionary in its origin, and drew its powers, not from the States, but from the people, the original source, under God, of all political power. The States were never supreme and unlimited in their sovereignty, never possessed as political organizations, and therefore could never delegate, the privileges which belong to the national Government. On the contrary, they received their existence as States independent of the British Government by an act of the national Congress of 1776. The people created and exercised the functions of a national Government before they severed the dependent colonial governments from their allegiance to the Crown, and made them independent in their internal and local affairs. The sovereignty of the people is the fountain of political prerogatives, and the right to make war and peace, to make treaties, and to emit bills of credit, to raise armies and regulate trade, and other kindred powers, were never in the possession of the colonies or the States to delegate to another. But the habits of thought and the political predilections springing from their antecedent colonial condition, and the apprehended danger of suffering the revolutionary government to exercise undefined and discretionary powers for a period of years amid the hazards and temptations of war, led to the establishment of the Confederacy. That, in its practical operation, if not in theory, was a pure political agency shorn of all the attributes and powers of a national Government, by being made dependent in its legislative, judicial, and executive action upon the opinion and will of the States, jealous of each other and of their independent sovereignty. Legislation was not allowed to lay its authority upon individuals, but terminated with the States, and could only be executed by military force. And here, too, it was powerless; for it could raise neither men nor money, except at the discretion of the States, which, by combination, could defy its authority. Any attempt to enforce its acts against a recalcitrant State would have been a perilous revolution.

Why, sir, the fatal policy had hardly been planted ere its legitimate harvest of ruin had been garnered in the very spring-time of our national existence.

The earnest remonstrances and solemn warnings of Washington were constantly interposed to sustain the courage and harmonize the efforts of the people in their unequal struggle, yet the system which some gentlemen still cling to with the devotion and blindness of an eastern devotee engendered such confusion of counsel and inefficiency of administration that the national energies were paralyzed, and union and liberty rescued from an impending catastrophe only by the help of foreign troops and foreign money.

The political anarchy and utter prostration of every material interest that followed the peace of 1783 have been drawn with such matchless power by him whose comprehensive and philosophic genius has rendered his name peerless on the roll of statesmen who adorned that splendid era, that for us to linger upon it would be vain as an effort to add darkness to night or luster to the sun. Now, sir, it was while the nation lay powerless in that Serboman bog, that the Convention of 1787 met "to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity." Would they attempt this, sir, by repeating the folly of a league of States, the essential defects of which they had learned by a bitter experience, and the inevitable results of which Madison, one of their own number, has depicted with surpassing skill and illustrated by familiar examples stretching along the path of history from the Amphictyonic Council to the confederacy of the United Netherlands? They did no such thing. They were engaged in reconstructing their political institutions for the express purpose of establishing a Government which should not be obliged to act through State interposition, and the Constitution which they framed, when adopted became the paramount expression of the popular will.

The old Government, as Curtis has said, was "destitute of the essence of political sovereignty," but the new possesses the essence, and exercises the functions, of a sovereignty. To it has been given the right, through its Supreme Court, to define and limit its own powers, and it is made, by virtue of its being the direct legislation of the people in their original and united capacity, the supreme law of the land, the whole land, State laws of every description, and however enacted, to the contrary notwithstanding. "If a number of political societies," says Story, "enter into a larger political society, the laws which the latter may enact pursuant to the powers entrusted to it by its constitution must necessarily be supreme over those societies and the individuals of whom they are composed." No evidence can be more conclusive upon this point than the records of the Convention. It will be recollected that three leading systems of government were propounded—a federal system, by Patterson, of New Jersey; a mixed system, by Randolph, of Virginia, and a purely national system, by Hamilton, of New York. That finally adopted was a mixed system, in which the national element largely predominated. "Can we, as representatives of independent States," says Patterson, "annihilate the essential powers of independence?" After arguing the question, he continues:

"It therefore follows that a national government, upon the present plan, is unjust, and destructive of the common principles of reciprocity."

How different from this is the language of Hamilton:

"I have well considered the subject, and am convinced that no amendment of the Confederation can answer the purpose of a good government so long as the State sovereignties do, in any shape, exist."

He even doubted the efficiency of the Virginia system. But it was finally adopted by a decided majority, and Mr. Randolph spoke, as follows:

"The resolutions from Virginia must have been adopted on the supposition that a federal government was impracticable, and it is said that power is wanting to institute such a government; but when our all is at stake I will consent to any mode that will preserve us."

In view of such evidence can there be a doubt that the Convention that framed and the conventions that adopted the Constitution regarded it as the charter of a government mainly national in its character? Where, then, does this vagrant, transcendental sovereignty of which gentlemen speak with bated breath and trembling reverence reside? By what authority does it utter its dicta against the supremacy of the people, which underlies the entire framework of government? Does not the same right that authorized the people to legislate the organic law into existence reside with them still to amend or abrogate that law by such methods as they themselves have designated?

Sir, there is but one conclusion which can be logically reached on this question. If our Government were purely confederate, the consent of each party to the contract would be necessary to an amendment of the Constitution. If it were purely national, a major vote of the whole people would make it binding upon all, though the unanimous vote of entire sections were against it, for the organic law is their legislation. But being a mixture of both, the people have made it the law that the major votes of three fourths of the States, however given to any amendment, shall be binding upon all. That is the Constitution, and New Hampshire, and Kentucky, and every other State must be bound by an amendment so ratified, though the unanimous votes of the State should be cast against it. And the right of Congress to recommend amendments by prescribed methods is as broad as the right of amendment itself. I do not deny that a State, under these circumstances, may repudiate the plighted faith of the fathers, and elect a revolution rather than submission. But, sir, when any one of the old sisterhood of thirteen, or any daughter since born into the family of States and reared into a vigorous and prosperous maturity by the fostering care of the Government, shall thus prove recreant to the original bond, let her not complain if she is forced to drink the cup of blood and desolation to its very dregs, and let the unhallowed footsteps of no man desecrate these Halls consecrated to liberty who would justify or palliate "the deep damnation of her taking off."

And now, sir, are there any limitations except those specified in the Constitution to the right of amendment? One gentleman asserts that limitations are "to be found in its intent, and its spirit, and its foundation idea." Another tells us we are to look for limitations in the preamble to the Constitution. But as the preamble is only a general expression of the intent, and spirit, and underlying idea of the instrument itself, the difference between the honorable gentlemen is one of definitions, and not of ideas. Justice, tranquility, defense, the general welfare, and liberty are the ends of government; but the English definition of justice and liberty in the twelfth century is not the definition of the nineteenth. Our interpretation of these terms in the future of our history will vary with education and local prejudices. The means which we should feel authorized to employ for the public defense and general welfare might have been deemed extravagant, and possibly revolutionary in the piping days of peace.

To say that this power is limited by the idea of the Constitution, however or wherever expressed or implied, is as indefinite as to say that extension is limited by space. Who, sir, is to determine the intent of the organic law, and the proper means by which its objects are to be secured, but the people themselves? And will not their ideas advance and change with the progress of civilization? That there are moral limitations to legislation and to popular sovereignty, I should be the last to deny. This constitutes the higher law, which when violated either by legislative assemblies or by popular majorities, justifies, nay sanctifies the exercise of the right of revolution. But our fathers were not guilty of the extreme folly of attempting the impossible task of enumerating all possible applications of the divine law of limitations.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] says in the course of his remarks:

"I am discussing the question which is put forth so ostentatiously by the other side of the House, that under the Constitution, not by the right of revolution, under its clauses and provisions, there exists the power to make this amendment."

Now, sir, if I understand the implication of this sentence, it is a denial of a right to the people to make any amendment to the Constitution which shall enlarge the powers of the Government by trenching upon the reserved powers of the States, even though for the public welfare. Is not that an assumption? Or if it rests upon any reasoning, would not the same logic deny to a State the right to modify its constitution so as to interfere with the rights of the inhabitants of a town, even when public health and public morals demanded it? State constitutions are adopted by as many separate votes as there are towns in a State, but the State does not thereby become a compact and lose the right to amend its fundamental law, except by a majority vote in every town.

The right to change the limitation of State powers must reside in the constitutional majority to whom, by a vote of the people of all the States, the paramount interests of the nation were confided at the first. There probably never was a more delicate and difficult task confided to the judgment of statesmen than the division and proper adjustment of powers between the General and State Governments by the Constitutional Convention. All the past of our colonial and revolutionary life centered there. All the great interests of our moral, social, and political future hung upon it. The proper balancing of these governmental forces could only be hoped for through the teachings of experience. The Convention understood perfectly well the difficult nature of the work devolved upon it. Would it not, therefore, be a reflection either upon the wisdom of the fathers or our own sanity to suppose they did not make provision in the Constitution for such a readjustment of powers or elimination of adverse elements as the future should prove to be necessary to harmonize the action or perpetuate the existence of free institutions?

"I trust the friends of the proposed Constitution," says Hamilton, "will never concur with its enemies in questioning that fundamental principle of republican government which admits the right of the people to alter or abolish the established Constitution whenever they find it inconsistent with their happiness."

I go still further, sir, and claim that the right of gradual and peaceful revolution was purposely framed into the groundwork and superstructure of our institutions so as to obviate forever the necessity for violent and bloody revolutions. The most terrific struggles which history records have been between old forms of civilization, entrenched in the unyielding framework of government, and the resistless energies of a more advanced intellectual and moral life striving to realize itself in better institutions. Marathon and Runnymede were efforts to throw off an effete absolutism which hung as a clog upon the progress of ideas. The history of the common law, and of the English Government, is a record of revolutions by which the people have advanced through successive stages to their present condition of freedom and enlightenment.

The past was not lost upon the men who framed our Government. The right of amendment and the system of representation, by which men familiar with public opinion and the wants and prejudices of the masses are brought to the work of legislation, enables us to mold and adapt our Government and laws by peaceful methods to the progressive changes of society. This was not accident, but a wise provision of political sagacity. Again it is claimed that the passage of this resolution would interfere with the rights of property, and is therefore unconstitutional. I might reply that the municipal act upon which the right to property in man is predicated is in contravention to the law of natural justice, and cannot establish a claim which "white men are bound to respect." Theft and robbery, though sanctioned by legislative authority, cannot absolve man from his allegiance to that law which is supreme and infallible. The enactment which reduces an accountable being, however humble and degraded, to the condition of a chattel, that subjects him to unrequited toil and hopeless ignorance, that multiplies men for the market, oblivious of domestic ties, and presses the cup of mixed and measureless woe to the lips of helpless women and innocent children without pity and without remorse, has no force as law. I diffidently, but fearlessly, deny, upon this floor, that any assembly of human law-makers ever possessed the power to create a right of property in man which we, as men, or citizens of the Republic, are bound to respect. Why, sir, the humblest daughter of sorrow that ever crouched beneath the lash of the task-master, lifting her fervent prayer to that Judge "that no king can corrupt," appeals to a tribunal before which the trembling slave stands the peer of her proud master, whose pleasure is the price of her shame, and who eats bread in the sweat of her brow.

But, sir, allowing this claim of property in black men, will it not be pertinent to the argument to call to the remembrance of this House the direct interference of the framers of the Government with this prescriptive right, by laying a constitutional prohibition upon the commerce in men? Will it not be germane to the question to remind gentlemen that the eloquent Henry, in the convention of Virginia, opposed the adoption of the Constitution on the plea that, if made the fundamental law by the adoption of the people, it would give, not to the nation through the right of amendment, but to Congress directly, the power to abolish slavery. Patrick Henry did not stand alone in that interpretation. Similar views were entertained in the conventions of other States. Now, I claim that the fears of those gentlemen of what they supposed had been done were an admission of what might be done. I have yet to learn that the statesmen of that day argued the incompetency of the people, directly by a constitutional provision or indirectly by an act of Congress based on a grant of power in the Constitution, to abolish what all admitted to be a moral wrong and a political evil. Their opposition was based on the plea of political policy and social necessity, both of which have been reversed in this grander revolution of our time. The memorable words of Randolph in reply to Henry, "I hope that there is none here who, considering the subject in the calm light of philosophy, will advance an objection dishonorable to Virginia; that at the moment they are securing the rights of their citizens, an objection is started that there is a spark of hope that these unfortunate men now held in bondage may, by the operation of the General Government be made free," are worthy to be inscribed in imperishable characters upon the dome of the Capitol, and God grant that their spirit may inspire us in the discharge of our solemn duties in this hour of regeneration to the Republic. It cannot, sir, have faded from the recollection of the students of political history that violent and sectional opposition to the Constitution was overcome and all the States brought to its adoption by pressing home upon the recalcitrants in the conventions the assurance that the instrument would be open to subsequent amendment on all the vital interests of the State.

And now shall we, whose industry is sustaining a financial burden that would stagger an Atlas, and whose eyes are riveted upon the grassless trenches where hundreds of thousands of our brave and glorified children sleep in their blood-stained coats of war, in this hour of our great peril forego this essential privilege through a morbid pity and a suspicious regard for the constitutional rights of men who have forsworn the Constitution, forfeited every right under the Government, and who can claim nothing at the hand of justice but the penalty of treason? Sir, it would be a shame and a reproach.

In seeking to purge our institutions of the mortal taint of slavery, in seeking to rescue our liberties by an organic change from the fatal imperium in imperio, it is not necessary to fix the ethnological position of the African or to prove his equality with the white races. Remembering that the descendants of the sons of Israel are now a by-word and a hissing among the Gentiles; that the barbarian whom the proud old Greek despised has become his master in all the arts and virtues of a Christian civilization; that the offspring of the half-civilized and bloody men whom the Roman historian located in the forests of Germany and Britain are now giving literature and science, liberty and law, to the nations, let us deferentially leave to the African, who since the building of the monuments of Egypt has borne the burdens of the world, to solve the vexed problem, and, under Providence, to determine for himself his appointed place in the social scale. If the poets and orators of the sable race, whose light has fallen upon our horizon, are the morning stars of a brighter day that is to dawn upon that benighted family of men, let not us who have grown rich upon their docile labor and long-suffering, be found fighting against the counsels of Him who should "work within us both to will and to do of His own good pleasure."

Nor need we be frightened with the horrors of miscegenation which have been drawn with such artistic skill by my learned friend from Ohio. This deadly Upas is only the product of a night, which has grown without roots and lost its promise of political fruits in the rhetoric of flowers. The African, sir, has been driven North by the force of slavery. Let him be free, and he gravitates to the tropics as naturally and as certainly as the winged people of the air migrate at the approach of winter. The laws of nature will not accommodate themselves to the policy of party politics.

Some gentlemen, too, seem to fear a fair competition between free white and black labor. Now, if the black man belongs to a more intellectual and vigorous race than we, then he ought to triumph in the conflict, and will. But if the white man has a larger brain, stronger and more enduring muscles, and a more active temperament than the black, then he will conquer in this legitimate conflict, and will gradually push the weaker race from the continent, leaving this heritage of liberties to our children after us to the latest generation. Can any man doubt the result? Why, sir, the present servile condition of four millions of this people is a prophecy of the future. Let the negro be free, and if he had no Africa to flee to as a refuge from the restless and insatiable Saxon, he would repeat the sad history of the proud but fading people that once played upon these waters and ruled with a native majesty of power where we now sit in council and sway the destinies of a great empire. I doubt not, sir, they will wander to other shores; but like Æneas and his companions they will carry with them the elements of a civilization in which other lands and future ages will rejoice. Emancipation, like mercy, will bless him that gives and him that receives.

Why is it that the mineral treasures of the South sleep in her mountains and valleys as at the dawn of creation? Why have not the primitive oaks upon her sunny plains been transformed into masts, and her hemp manufactured into sails by her own population? Why have not the fleets of a rich and civilizing commerce filled the safe harbors which the creative hand hollowed out upon her extended coast? It is because her own brave people have foregone their privileges and given over their fair and rich inheritance to the ignorant and thriftless labor of bondmen. And can they, sir, who have thus spurned the hand of Providence complain if the Master gives to another that which they have neglected to improve for a century? When this thriftless system shall have been supplanted by an educated and enterprising population of free laborers, the measureless wealth of her mines and soil will pass into productive capital or be transformed into the material comforts and moral forces of an advancing civilization. Let peace once more return to our land, bearing in her hands the broken chains of a disinherited people as the emblems of victory, and the industrial energies of an intelligent population, regenerated by the spirit of liberty in its last bloody struggle with the fiend of slavery, will sweep debt from the land and cover every acre of it with the glad tokens of plenty, prosperity, and power.

The amendment of the Constitution by the people, to which the passage of this resolution looks, will effect an immediate good. It will give an easy and ready solution to the difficult questions arising under the proclamation of emancipation and bills of reconstruction.

Sir, we can afford to exercise the largest charity and a magnanimous generosity in restoring the disaffected States and bringing back a disloyal people to their allegiance, but this institution of slavery, which has sown dragons' teeth in our legislation, embittered the intercourse of social life, and at last forced upon us the horrors of civil war, must now perish. A land

"With all the gifts that heaven and earth impart,
The smiles of nature and the charms of art,
While proud oppression in her valleys reigns, is not a worthy exemplar of the work of civil liberty. The Constitution was not designed to defeat itself by limiting action when the public security and social progress demand it. That instrument is itself the result of amendments to the Articles of Confederation, sufficiently radical and extensive to change the nature of government, and was adopted by a method not justified by those Articles, and therefore revolutionary. This was the work of men whose names are to be spoken without reproach, and justified on the plea of public necessity in a time of profound peace. And shall we hesitate to do what the national salvation demands in a time of war and public calamity on account of imaginary obstacles? Posterity will comprehend the import and grandeur of this great struggle between the antagonistic forces of freedom and slavery as we cannot, and will be amazed and humbled as they read the record of our higgling and flimsy pretenses for delay over this great question. The voices of our murdered heroes sleeping on a thousand victorious battle-fields in rebellious States, and still other voices from the dim but glorious hereafter of our history, call upon us for immediate and decisive action. We must meet our responsibilities like men, for we are not engaged in a holiday pageant. This is revolution—solemn, earnest, terrible revolution.
And tyranny usurps her happy plains,"

"Salus populi suprema est lex," must be the shibboleth of the friends of the Republic.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to make a political speech on this occasion, but only to discuss the question of the power of "the Congress" over amendments to the Constitution of the United States. Whatever power "the Congress" may have in this behalf is derived from article five, section one, of the Constitution, which provides—

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intent and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress; provided that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses of the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

If this language is to receive ordinary interpretation I cannot well see how legal minds can differ in its construction. It expressly provides for an amendment of this instrument, and it clearly defines the mode of procedure.

There are but three restrictions upon the action of Congress in the letter of this instrument, one of which relates to the migration of persons prior to the year 1808, and the others to taxation and equal suffrage in the Senate. As far, then, as the question under consideration is concerned, it is precisely the same as if there were no limitations whatever in the Constitution. "The Congress," thus empowered, as defined by the Constitution, "shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." This body is now in session, and it proposes to exercise one of its supposed powers.

But it is claimed by one who is recognized as a leader of the other side of this House [Mr. PENDLETON] that "three fourths of the States do not possess constitutional power to pass this amendment." Others admit this power exists, but they deny the expediency of its exercise.

I shall speak of these propositions in their order.

The framers of the Constitution, as I claim, clothed "the Congress" with power to propose and three fourths of the several States with power to ratify amendments thereto. The language of this instrument is so explicit that in my judgment it will not admit of two interpretations. That the framers of this instrument so understood it is evident from their contemporaneous sayings and writings. At page 402 of the Federalist we find the following:

"It appears to me susceptible of complete demonstration, that it will be far more easy to obtain subsequent than previous amendments to the Constitution. The moment an alteration is made in the present plan, it becomes, to the purpose of adoption, a new one, and must undergo a new decision of each State. To its complete establishment throughout the Union it will therefore require the concurrence of thirteen States. If, on the contrary, the Constitution should be ratified by all the States as it stands, alterations may at any time be effected by nine States. In this view alone the chances are as thirteen to nine (it should be ten) in favor of subsequent amendments, rather than of original adoption of an entire system."

Thus one who participated in the duties of framing this instrument clearly recognizes this power, and he urges the adoption of the Constitution as it was then written, even if it were imperfect, insisting that such imperfections could be more readily removed by subsequent amendments than by original action. This subject was publicly discussed, and then the Constitution was adopted by the suffrages of those who well understood the force of its provisions. That no one doubted the power of Congress and of the States over this subject at that time is evident from the fact that Congress, at a session thereof held in the city of New York in the year 1789, proposed twelve amendments to the Constitution, then but recently adopted, and submitted the same to the several States, ten of which amendments were adopted, and they are now as valid as any portion of the original instrument. "The Congress" of 1789 derived its power in this behalf from the same article by virtue of which "the Congress" of 1865 proposes to act. The powers and the restrictions, as far forth as this question is concerned, were the same then as now. This was a practical interpretation of this instrument by its founders. Here I might rest this case; but inasmuch as there is a conflict of views upon this subject among the honorable members of this House, I am constrained to devote a few moments to the arguments of the opponents of this measure.

The honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] says:

"The Democratic party, the old Whig party, and the Republican party, until lately, always claimed and held that this institution of slavery was peculiarly under the province of the individual States, and when the States entered into this confederated Government, the powers that they did not delegate to the Government were expressly reserved to the States; that no power not delegated to the General Government could by the force of any amendment of the Constitution be taken away from the States, because they had only confederated themselves together for the purposes laid down in the organic act, and because it would be an act of the CREATOR not given by its CREATOR."

Here is a strange mixture of truth and error. The great political parties of which the honorable gentleman speaks only mooted the rights of the respective States, in reference to enactments appertaining to their own internal matters; the question before this House is, what power has "the Congress" over amendments to this organic act? The propositions are unlike.

Again, the honorable gentleman says: "The States entered into this confederated Government." I much fear the gentleman's reading, as well as his rendering of the Constitution, is at fault. He must have confounded the old obsolete Articles of Confederation and the present Constitution. The former was a confederation of States, as appears from its preamble:

"Article of confederation and perpetual union between the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island, and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia."

This confederacy was dissolved in the year 1787, and it gave place to a confederacy of the people. This new Confederacy, as evidence of its intention, adopted a preamble to its Constitution which is remarkably expressive. It reads:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution of the United States of America."

Here are no political divisions, no geographical boundaries. This is a Union of an entire people. States and State lines are entirely ignored. Therefore, when the gentleman speaks of the present, he should use language suited to the age in which we live. Such a confederacy as he describes once existed, but it has passed away. I do not mean by this that there are no corporate States with certain independent and sovereign powers, but I do mean that through and by virtue of this Constitution, ordained by the people of the United States, it subordinated each State, so far as the letter and spirit of this instrument are concerned. This was not an act of the separate States, as such, but it was the act of the sovereign power in this Government. Indeed, no Government can exist without sovereignty. Sovereignty is its life and its motive power. This sovereignty in the Government of the United States rests not in corporate States, but in the people. From this source all municipal power is derived.

The honorable gentleman, in his remarks, mistakes the issue. The question is not one of slavery, but of the power of Congress over another subject. It is purely a legal, not a political proposition. The question is the same as though slavery were unknown. We are to shut out every consideration except the power of Congress over amendments, without reference to the subjects of them. The power of Congress is one thing, and the expediency of the exercise of this power is another. It is important to distinguish between them.

One word more, and I have done with the argument of the honorable gentleman from New Jersey. He says:

"No power not delegated to the General Government could, by the force of any amendment of the Constitution, be taken from the States."

The States have delegated nothing to the General Government. The General Government is not the creature of the States, but of an entire people. The people established a Constitution, and provided therein for amendments thereto. The people delegated nothing. They clothed "the Congress" with the power to initiate, and reserved the right of final decision. The creator of this Government and its organic law (the people) clothed its creature ("the Congress") with certain express powers, but it never delegated any power to change any portion of this organic act.

I repeat, the question under consideration is not one of a domestic, or any other, institution, excepting incidentally. If any system, no matter what, shall be found in any State which conflicts with the foundation purposes of the General Government, as expressed in the letter or in the spirit of the Constitution, it furnishes a reason for the exercise of the power with which "the Congress" is clothed by its creator.

This is in no sense an interference with such system; on the contrary, such system, by reason of its own acts, renders an otherwise dormant power operative, and hence it compels this action.

We erect penitentiaries, but except men transgress they are tenantless. We grant powers to legislative bodies, but their exercise depends upon the circumstances of each case. A given act, or the practical working of a system, domestic or otherwise, may be the occasion of legislation, and yet by no means the object of it. So in the case in hand: slavery, of its own act, constrains the exercise of a power in "the Congress" which otherwise might have remained dormant for ages. As well may the felon complain of the enactments in a criminal statute, as slavery to complain in the case in hand. But it does not follow that the existence of this power authorizes its possessors to exercise it at will.

The honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] claims in substance that three fourths of the several States may abolish this Government, and that it may then "elect the king of Dahomey to be their autocrat." If the honorable gentleman means that three fourths of the States have the physical power to do this as a man has the muscular power to commit murder, he may be right. But if he means that three fourths of the several States may do this by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, I beg leave to differ with him. Such an act would be no amendment, but an actual and wanton subversion of the Constitution. It would be an unhallowed revolution. I discriminate between physical force and constitutional power. There is a substratum to the Constitution. There is a foundation power to this instrument. It is the law of nature. It existed before the world was; and before the adoption of this instrument its authors announced certain fundamental truths which were borrowed from this law, and they antedate all human Governments. Among these truths are the following: all men are endowed with certain inalienable rights; that to secure these Governments are instituted, and such Governments derive their powers from the consent of the governed.

It was in view of these truths, and for the purpose of enjoying their advantages, that our fathers ordained and established the Constitution now sought to be amended. This law, which antedates human Governments, is what I denominate the "higher law." It is a law recognized by all elementary writers, and is engraven upon the hearts of all men. It is the doctrine which teaches that any human law that conflicts with the laws of God should be pronounced of no binding force by our courts. This law, among other things, declares, "Thou shalt not steal." Who will insist that any enactment which should command the commission of larceny could be enforced in any of our courts? Yet our Constitution is silent upon this subject; therefore I say to the honorable gentleman, three fourths of the States of this Union may do nothing which infracts or tends to defeat the objects for which our national charter was established.

I am happy to say in letter (but I fear not in spirit) I am sustained in this view by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, who was recently a candidate for a high office, [Mr. PENDLETON.] He says:

"I assert that there is another limitation [to amendments of the Constitution] stronger than the letter of the Constitution, and that is found in its intent, and its spirit, and its foundation idea."

This "intent" and "foundation idea" is embodied in the expressive preamble of our Constitution. I commend it to the gentleman and invoke of him a careful perusal. From it, we shall learn that one of the primary objects of this Constitution was to "establish justice." If this object has failed, whence is it, and why? Is it in consequence of any system within any portion of our Government? Is slavery unjust in all of its workings? Is it at war with the "foundation idea" of our Constitution? If it is, then is this system the occasion, not the object of the amendment.

Another purpose of this instrument was to "insure domestic tranquillity." Has slavery contributed to this object, or has it engendered discord and finally embroiled the nation in a civil war? Who will answer? If the answer is affirmative, then has this system defeated the purpose of the Constitution.

A further purpose of this Constitution was to "promote the general welfare." How strangely has slavery aided in this work. Look at our new-made graves, our maimed citizens, our impoverished Treasury, and our widows and orphans, as evidence of its doings. Humanity weeps over its deeds of horror and of crime. Should it have perpetuity?

But above all, this Constitution was framed to secure the blessings of "liberty" to those who ordained it, and also to their "posterity." Has it accomplished this? What hindered it? Let the trembling victims in our slave pens and the bondmen and bondwomen at the auction-stand be heard. Consult the pages of the recording angel, and then compute the sorrows of the millions who have been deprived of "liberty" under a Constitution ordained expressly to secure these blessings to its subjects. Yet the honorable gentleman says "the States have no power to amend this organic act." This amendment does not propose to infract the letter, the spirit, nor the intent of this instrument; it only proposes to conform it in letter to the explicitly avowed objects for which it was ordained and established. Is it wicked to do this? Is it unconstitutional to provide absolutely for the establishment of justice, domestic tranquillity, the promotion of the general welfare, and the blessings of liberty? This is what is sought for.

I have supposed that a nation, as an individual, always had the right to reform. The converse would perpetuate error and give permanence even to a despotism. This doctrine practically carried out would bar all improvement and forever crush the hopes of the oppressed in every land. To the proper exercise of this reformatory power minorities must submit. This is not oppression, but one of the highest types of constitutional freedom. Constitutions are framed for the general interests of their subjects. They are checks upon majorities; to minorities they are safeguards. They are binding upon each, and each should respect and obey their commands. Disobedience upon the part of either is alike ruinous and unjustifiable.

The intent of the Constitution is particularly manifest from its expressive preamble; and being manifest, what is the duty of "the Congress?" Clearly to heed its utterances as absolutely as though it were so written in the body of the instrument. Hence I hold "the Congress" has the power, and it is its duty to submit, and the several States have power to ratify, any amendment which comes within the averments of this preamble. This is not because it is so written therein, but it results from the high consideration that this preamble announces the true objects of government, proclaims primeval truth, and being in consonance with the divine will as read in nature and in revelation, human laws may not infract or abrogate any of its provisions; but on the contrary they should conform the letter of the Constitution to its requirements. This is a doctrine which has "its home in the human heart." These last words are the language of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] used in vindication of the right of revolution. I use them in vindication of the eternal principles which, unobstructed, would render revolutions unnecessary.

The same honorable gentleman, warming with his subject, exclaims, "Can three fourths of the States make an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which shall prohibit the State of Ohio from having two Houses in its Legislative Assembly?" He adds, "It is not forbidden in the Constitution, the letter of the Constitution is not against it. Why is it," continues he, "this change cannot be made? I will tell why," he concludes; "it is because republicanism lies at the very foundation of our system of government." Is this the true reason? I submit in this illustration the honorable gentleman does equal injustice to his reading as also to his logic. He ought to know that no one claims the power to make wanton or useless amendments to this instrument. Indeed, the clause authorizing amendments to the Constitution expressly limits "the Congress" to amendments which it shall deem necessary. Necessary for what? Clearly for the general good. He also knows that no law ever enacted can be justified upon any other pretense; that the organization of society is a necessity, and that the simplest law and the mildest form of government are infractions of natural liberty, and are permitted only from the necessities of man. Hence all statesmen agree that the fewer laws, the least restraint upon personal rights in carrying on Government compatible with executive force and perpetuity, the nearer such Government approaches perfection. The justice and the necessity of the case is the true test under all circumstances, whether a law or a provision in a constitution is essential. By this rule I would try each case.

Hence I apprehend it does not follow that because "three fourths of the States" may not do an unnecessary and foolish thing, that therefore they may not do a necessary and wise act. I would reply to the honorable gentleman's illustration, the reason why three fourths of the States may not so amend the Constitution as to prohibit the Legislature of Ohio from having two Houses is because it is unnecessary for the promotion of any general good. Suppose it could be demonstrated that the existence of two separate Houses in the Legislature of Ohio, in its practical and legitimate working, proved destructive of the rights, liberties, tranquillity, and prosperity of the honorable gentleman's constituents, and subversive of the foundations of the General Government, what would the honorable gentleman then say? Then the cases were parallel. No one pretends that it is enough to warrant an amendment to the Constitution that it does not conflict with its express letter. There must be some great necessity for it. The other illustrations given by the honorable gentleman upon this point are equally irrelevant and frivolous. Were the matter in court, upon proper application, they would be stricken out as such.

I conclude, therefore, that "the Congress" has the power under the Constitution to propose amendments thereto when two thirds thereof shall deem it necessary, and that three fourths of the several States may approve of or reject such propositions at will. This being so, the necessity or expediency of the measure remains.

A few words upon these points and I have done. Were it not for certain erroneous adjudications of our State and Federal courts, I apprehend the proposed amendment were wholly unnecessary. I am firm in the faith that the Constitution of the United States, properly interpreted, would tolerate no slave within its jurisdiction. Slavery and our cumulated woes have grown out of an erroneous construction of the provisions of this instrument. There is no law by virtue of which man can be held as property. Were such laws enacted, being in direct conflict with the "foundation idea" of our Constitution, they would be void. In this I am sustained by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] who says, "Congress can no more make a slave than it can make a king." His object, however, was to show, if Congress cannot make a slave, therefore it cannot unmake one. But if Congress "cannot make a slave," pray how can a State? Has Congress as much legislative power as has a State Legislature? Nay; the honorable gentleman is right in his assertion; and I will affirm that no legislative power under the jurisdiction of our Constitution can make a slave. If this is true, the necessity of this amendment arises from the erroneous adjudications of our courts. They, notwithstanding the great doctrines of the Constitution, have recognized property in man. Hence the necessity of a provision positively inhibiting slavery in any of the United States. Sir, it is sometimes alleged that the framers of the Constitution entered into a compromise upon the subject of slavery prior to its adoption. This I deny. This compromise was not between freedom and slavery, but it was a compromise solely between the majority and the minority of the people of the United States. Had there been a compromise between freedom and slavery, the representatives of the latter would have demanded the insertion of a clause in the Constitution similar to the amendment proposed by Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, in 1851, which the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] voted for. It reads as follows:

"No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere within any State with the domestic institution thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State."

The majority agreed never to insert any new provision into the organic act unless two thirds of the Congress should deem it necessary, and then three fourths of the States should approve of it before it should be valid. Thus guarded the minority undertook and provided that they would yield obedience to all and any changes thus inaugurated and approved; provided always they did not conflict with the letter or the spirit of this organic act.

In view, therefore, of the erroneous adjudications of our courts, to which I have alluded, and in consequence of a perverted public sentiment induced therefrom, prudence dictates that our safety in the present as well as in the future requires the insertion of an express clause in the Constitution forever prohibiting slavery in any State of the Union. I say the present and the future safety of our country requires this, for under our Constitution as it is now written man has been held as property, his civil rights have been wantonly trampled under foot, God's law openly violated, and our country has been brought to the verge of ruin.

One question remains. Is this amendment expedient? I will not insult this House or the country with an argument upon this point. I should as soon expect a hearing in the demonstration of a self-evident proposition; for if it is expedient to do right, if slavery is wrong, if "righteousness exalteth a nation," if "sin is a reproach to any people," if obedience to the commands of God is a duty, if national prosperity and the unity and the perpetuity of our Government are desired, then is this measure expedient. Its adoption involves all of these, and its rejection imperils all. There is nothing partisan in this measure; it will serve all interests. Hence, why honorable gentlemen will oppose it, and thus invoke the judgments of God, and defy the will of the people as recently expressed, and dig for themselves ignominious graves, is beyond my comprehension.

The honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] says "the Democratic party were always opposed to slavery." I will not, I have no inclination, to controvert this at a time when such mighty interests are involved. But I will say, that true Democracy never had and never can have any sympathy with human bondage; and if the Democratic party is now opposed to slavery, as the honorable gentleman avers, the country may take heart, for all parties now harmonize upon this question, which has heretofore divided and distracted the councils of the nation. I cannot see why any one who believes slavery to be wrong can wish to perpetuate it. May we not do in fact what the universal judgment of all men approves? The honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] says "slavery is dead." So said my colleague from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.] If this is true, and who will dispute their veracity, can any one complain if we clinch the nails that hold the lid of its coffin?

Therefore I hope to see the Democrats unite with the Union men in this act, which will forever prohibit an institution which all deplore and condemn. The fruits of this act are not partisan but they are national.

Mr. Speaker, I apprehend there are very few of those who are actively participating in the great national drama now being acted who realize the importance of the part they are severally performing. There are times when "words are things." The events as well as the utterances of the last four years shall have a future. They will be scrutinized by those who shall come after us, and their influence will affect the destinies of the Governments of the world. The United States, the respective corporate members thereof, and the several citizens of each, are making history. A record will be kept for future reference, and "woe betide" the man who neglects to improve the present. The legislator who only contemplates the present moment is strangely remiss. He who provides solely for the necessities of the immediate now is criminally negligent. Such a man would hesitate to plant a tree lest he might not gather of its fruit, or to build a house fearing he might not enjoy its continuous shelter. The sordidly selfish live not in the future. The benedictions of posterity never greet their ears or gladden their hearts. They are conservatives extreme.

Had Genoa's navigator acted upon this principle we were without a western continent, and civil liberty without a soil in which to germinate and mature. Had the Pilgrims only considered their own privations and perils, Plymouth Rock were without its immortality, and our representative Government without a place among the nations. Our ancestors had learned that Christianity was more than a ceremonial, and their descendants have demonstrated that democracy

(I mean democracy in its generic sense) is more than a name. They are principles, handmaids, coworkers, integral and essential parts of a free Government. They are known by their works. From the hour the morning stars first hymned their song of praise they have harmonized in plan and in purpose; and when they shall finally triumph, as triumph they will, then may we expect the blessings for which my colleague [Mr. BROOKS] so devoutly and earnestly prays, "Peace on earth and good will to men." Till then he need not hope. And allow me to assure him that a democracy that does not harmonize with true Christianity and freedom is essentially false. Had the patriots of 1776 considered the sacrifices only which would follow their acts, we were yet dependents and vassals of the British Crown. Had their descendants in 1861 looked only to their personal case, we were now a permanently despised and a degraded nation.

I cite these instances, not to lecture, but to admonish those who are actors in the present drama. The past has its lessons, the present, its duties, and the future its application of the teachings of history and experience. There is a tide in the affairs of nations as well as in men, which, when taken at its flood, leads to prosperity. Be it ours to watch its ebbing. The Puritan as he stood on the bleak shores of New England, saw a wilderness give place to cultivated fields, rude dwellings to comfortable mansions and populous cities, and savage life to civilized joys and culture. They saw the outlines of a Government which, when matured, "like the dews of heaven," would shower its blessings alike upon all. They saw the stone cut out of the mountain of freedom increase till it filled the entire earth. The vision inspired their hearts and nerved them to sacrifice and suffering. Shall we who enjoy the fruit of their privations and toil do less? I believe before God the hour has come in which, if we would avert the judgments of Heaven and save our nation from ruin, we must render our organic law explicitly affirmative on the great question of human slavery. This being done, we may hope for that peace for which the friends on the other side of this House so agonize and pray.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to take part in this discussion. A question so thoroughly argued before the country for a generation, and one on which political parties have pivoted so long, did not seem to me to need further elucidation. And I do not rise now, sir, so much to discuss and argue as to express my gratification at the prospect of the early and final settlement of all questions pertaining to slavery by the entire destruction of the system.

When, something more than a quarter of a century ago, just commencing active life, I made myself conspicuous in a limited sphere by attacking slavery, I had no expectation of taking part here and now in the grand consummation of its utter demolition.

I had no idea then, sir, that it would live so long. As it could be demonstrated to be wrong, contrary to natural right, and tending always to the practice of cruelties and barbarisms of revolting character, I thought it would die and the country be rid of it speedily.

But I was mistaken. Argument and demonstration had apparently but little effect upon it. Allying itself to the political parties of the country, it grew strong and rich and flourished vigorously in the face of opposition. It dictated terms of adjustment of political differences, and everywhere was felt as the most powerful element of government in the country.

Starting out with friends who apologized for its existence as one of the necessary evils of society, something to be tolerated for a time only, it soon came to assume the bolder position of right. It left off accusing the English of fastening the system upon their colonies at a time when they could not resist, and thus placing the descendants of involuntary slaveholders in the condition Mr. Jefferson described as having the wolf by the ears and able neither to hold him or let him go.

The pro-slavery men threw away supplication. They asked no consideration on account of their history. They no longer deprecated the existence of slavery. Mr. Hilliard, of Alabama, and other frank and intelligent advocates, stated distinctly that their grounds of supporting the system had changed. They now advocated it because they believed it to be right. For the same reason they wished it more widely diffused. It was a proper relation between the two races, and where ever there were white men and black men there should be slavery.

But the extension of the system required the consent of the General Legislature. The establishment of new territorial governments and the admission of new States must be done by Congress.

Should this consent be given?

Upon this question parties were arrayed. The discussion became general. Political conventions declared themselves on the one side and the other. Few side issues were tolerated. The main question involved interests, social, religious, pecuniary, political, greater than were ever submitted to a popular election before.

It was decided against slavery. But the decision was simply that it was not such a blessing as should be extended. Very mild, surely! The organization which prevailed took great care to say that it would not object to the retention of existing slavery. It knew the extreme sensitiveness of the friends of the system, and would do nothing and say nothing that indicated a purpose to interfere with local authorities. Mr. Lincoln, as its organ, declared this with great emphasis in his inaugural address.

But this would not answer. The decision of the popular election, however softened in terms, was against the new pretensions of slavery. The people of the country had said, in accordance with the proper forms of law, that slavery was not one of the institutions to be cultivated, cherished, and boasted of.

And slavery accepted the decision as final. The discussion had gone on for a generation with great activity and been attended with much acrimony. The effort at repressing it with violence had failed. Opposing argument had failed. What, then, the use of another trial? No new evidence could be adduced in its favor. No law of God or man could be cited that was not already familiar. No new threat could be held high in menace over the action of the people in their primitive assemblages, or of the Representatives in their official character.

Slavery had failed in argument, failed in menace, failed in the popular vote.

But it would not yield. It did not believe in popular majorities. It had been contending against them for years. When it saw the coming decision it proclaimed long in advance that it deemed it invalid.

The only other resort left was that of violence. The ultima ratio of kings must be tried. It would establish itself as a Government, and would depend upon war to vindicate its right to be recognized among the Governments of men.

We all know the result. It had an infernal strength greater than any of us supposed. It has destroyed hundreds of thousands of the best and noblest of our youth. It has rendered desolate homes in every village and hamlet in the land. It has loaded our labor with burdens that it shall carry so long as the Government has an existence. It has subjected us to insult from abroad that we have been unable to repel. It has encouraged foreign nations to prey upon our commerce, and we have been unable to prevent the wrong or retaliate in kind. Stunned, blinded by the blows that it received in the contest, it thought, like Samson, if it must die, it would lay hold of the pillars of our temple of liberty, and mustering all its gigantic strength, it would perish in the common ruin.

But, thank God, we come out of the fierce contest victors. Bruised, bleeding, carrying wounds which shall be visible for centuries on the body-politic, as they now are in our streets on the persons of thousands and tens of thousands of noble men who had the patriotism and devotion to country which impelled them to the contest where the fight raged fiercest, still gloriously victorious, we may say with Isaiah, "The terrible one is brought to naught, and the scorner is consumed!"

And now, what shall be done with the demon that, after a career of lust and wrong unexampled in Christian countries, has added to the crimes growing out of its nature the wide-spread desolation which has been experienced everywhere in all the States of this Union?

Does any one hesitate to say let it die? Has it not deserved death and damnation for its crimes?

But it is said that the organic law intervenes and prevents the infliction of that just punishment; that somehow we have made a bargain that, come what will, we will not be allowed to rid the Government of slavery. If this be so, it is a gross defect in our organization. It makes slavery the "unpardonable sin" which no repentance can avail to rid ourselves of.

But how is this? Slavery is eminently a creature of law. No jurist maintains that it exists ex proprio vigore. No advocate of the system would rest it in anything short of well-defined law. Without the aid of positive enactments it dies. I know that nowhere in this country has it been established in terms. No statute in any State has said that hereafter slavery shall exist here; but it has done what is equivalent. It has gone into the detail of management, sale, conveyance, and descent of property in slaves. It has made a body of laws which have been dependent upon slavery as the central fact. Abolish them, and you abolish slavery. I say, then, slavery is everywhere the creature of positive law.

How is it, then, that the supreme law cannot reach so important a detail in local law?

The States gave certain rights to the General Government, and upon this the General Government started as a stock in trade. They stipulated in the original instrument that whenever, upon proper preliminary proceedings, three fourths of their number should agree to a further grant of power, then the General Government should have that power.

But it is said there are limits. Of course there are. But what? Are any to be found in the instrument itself? None.

It is suggested that they are to be found in the preamble. But can anybody examine the preamble and say that practically it has any limits?

It says:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

But what Government known among Christian nations might not adopt the same preamble, and, with show of reason, from its standpoint, adopt the same declaration?

It is so general as not even to specify the form of government which it intended to be established. Should the people of England, Ireland, and Scotland choose to reduce their constitution to writing, what would prevent the adoption of this preamble?

But the understanding, it is said, among the original contractors should govern. Can this rule prevail against positive enactment? I will not attempt to go into the history of the formation of this instrument. That has already been well done by able gentlemen who have preceded me. But I invoke the well-known rule of construction in ordinary contracts, that when the written agreement is not dubious, all previous debate is merged in it, and must be excluded from consideration in forming a judgment upon it.

Is the provision for amendment at all doubtful in its import? No one pretends that it is. The language speaks as plainly as language can, that any amendment which shall be made in accordance with its provisions shall become part of the instrument. Here is the provision:

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by three fourths of the Legislatures of the several States, or by conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress; provided that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

Except, then, the cases excepted in the provision I have read, and the power of amendment is unlimited in its terms.

And still there is a limit. What is it? It is the limit of all human law. All publicists agree that there is a limit to human law, no matter what may be the form of government. The nations' religion must necessarily control its written law. The best English writers upon law say this, and we need not their authority or anybody's authority to establish the proposition. Every man's religion is his sense of ultimate right. With us the thing goes up in regular gradation. The town is subordinate to the State. The State acknowledges the General Government to be superior. The General Government is inferior in law, as in everything else, to the great Ruler of events.

Higher-law doctrine, I know; but who does not acknowledge it? What man takes the other position, that his highest notions of morality are in the statutes? Would not honest men do well to play shy of such a man? Whoever knew a man who acted in accordance with the rule that he would deal with others no better than the law obliges him to do and did not pronounce him a scoundrel? Have we not all seen such men, and do they not oppress their neighbors by "getting the law of them" as they call it?

Nor is this the fault of the law. Every human law is necessarily imperfect. It cannot provide for all imaginable cases. And ingenious scoundrels will find opportunity to inflict wrong while acting within its provisions.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] who argued this question the other day put specified cases where it was manifest the General Government ought not to interfere with the States. But logically the force of those illustrations was derived from this higher law. In the instances put the General Government should not act, because it would be unjust. Neither he nor any other gentleman has put a case, within the proper limit of human law, which the power of an amended Constitution may not reach.

Men of science recognize the same rule of higher law. Some years since the corps of the Coast Survey came into my county in pursuance of its duties along our coast. They made a base line. The object was to find two points exactly six miles apart. To do this was the work of months. The most elaborate instruments were obtained. The expansion and contraction of metals was thoroughly considered. And after all the preparation, that experience and science could suggest was exhausted, ample time was taken in the measurement. All this being done, the most exact result possible was obtained. And the line got was just six miles long, no more and no less. Thousands of dollars expended and months of time had produced this precise thing. From this sprang triangulation along the coast, and measurements by instruments the most perfect known to man. One would think these intelligent gentlemen would have rested satisfied with this. But no; all this was fallible like every other human effort. They appealed to the higher law for correction.

Their work was submitted to the law that governs the stars. The heavens were explored, and ultimate accuracy was only obtained when it was ascertained that the work done on the face of the earth agreed with the deductions to be drawn from the coursing of the stars in the heavens; for these wise men well knew that the celestial orbs moved with unerring accuracy, knowing no variableness since the Creator of all threw them into space with the mandate:

"Roll on in your beauty, ye youthful spheres,
And weave the dance that measures the years."

Adopting this rule, certainly there can be no objection to the proposed amendment to the Constitution. The higher law not only sanctions, it demands in thunder tones that the system shall be eradicated without delay, and no vestige be left to annoy God or curse man.

Let it then be done, and let slavery be destroyed. And hereafter the only contest upon the subject will be who did the most to bring about this consummation so devoutly wished for by all good men. The earlier anti-slavery men shall have their full meed of praise. They did well. They brought the wrongs inherent in the institution to the attention of the people of the country. They would not be put down at the bidding of the imperious advocates of the system. But the system flourished under their attacks. It grew rich and strong. It waxed fat. How long it would have lived God only knows, if it had not injured itself. But it was not content. It destroyed itself. Our Davids were not powerful enough to inflict a mortal blow upon this modern Goliath, and Heaven would have it that the giant wrong of the age should commit suicide.

And when the genius of history shall write its epitaph on the walls of the great Hereafter, specifying the date of its death, short stay will it make in describing its virtues; but after cataloguing a portion of the great crimes it has committed against mankind, it will add, "Dead, dead not of Lloyd Garrison and Wendell Phillips, but dead of Jefferson Davis and the Montgomery constitution."

God speed the day of its burial, for with it as the creator ends this war of its creation, and liberty and peace shall come hand in hand and bless the continent with their presence.

Mr. ASHLEY obtained the floor.

And then, on motion of Mr. THAYER, (at three o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I present the memorial of William Cornell Jewett, communicating to the Senate of the United States certain facts of which he professes to have knowledge. Of course I have no knowledge of these facts and express no opinion as to the propriety or impropriety of the prayer contained in the memorial. Regarding the right to petition as a sacred one, a right to which every citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States, I present the paper as I would any other petition or memorial handed to me which was respectful in its terms. I ask that it be read and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware asks that this paper be read. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary proceeded to read the memorial, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Your memorialist begs leave to present to your honorable body for consideration the fact that the Singleton and Blair missions have signally failed, and there is therefore no hope of peace through negotiation; that it has now become apparent that France, Austria, Spain, and the Pope intend recognizing the confederacy after the reinauguration of President Lincoln; that to that end France and Austria have entered upon a division of the Mexican States with a view to a speedy acquisition of California, and the regulation of power upon this continent, under the policy that has controlled in Europe for the last century; that the issue now between the North and South is independence or extermination, under which banners the people must divide and rally; that it is folly to take any other view of our national position, and likewise folly to talk of the South as now being crushed, from alone "her spirit even more formidable than her arms," from her ability to purchase independence through slavery, and cooperation in extending European rule upon the American continent, and from a late declaration made by General Sherman, "that instead of the South being conquered the war had hardly commenced."

Your memorialist therefore prays that immediate steps be taken for the recognition of the independence of the confederacy, and with a view to securing those great commercial relations so highly important, and which will inure to the benefit of European Powers unless friendly relations of commerce, and an alliance offensive and defensive is entered into and secured for the benefit of the United States, before such advantages shall have been acquired by European Powers.

To provide against a misconstruction of motive, your memorialist hereby declares before God and man, that he sincerely believes such action indispensable to prevent a war with Europe and to successfully defend, preserve, and perpetuate the American Republic.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it usual to read petitions at length?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not, but the Senator from Delaware asked that this memorial should be read, and the Chair said it would be read if there was no objection; the Chair put the question, and no objection was made.

Mr. JOHNSON. Whose petition is it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know. It is one which was presented by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not usual to read such papers at length; and I object to its reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that it is signed by a man named William Cornell Jewett.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I care nothing about having the paper read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be objection to its reading, it will be for the Senate to determine.

Mr. CONNESS. I object.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object, not because I know what it contains, but if we get in the habit of reading petitions, the whole morning hour will be consumed in that way.

The VICE PRESIDENT put the question, and the Senate refused to allow the paper to be read. The memorial was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO A SENATOR.

Mr. NESMITH. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to give my colleague [Mr. HARDING] leave of absence for the remainder of the session.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 408) in addition to several acts for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of the Interior transmitting a copy of the supplemental report from the chief engineer of the Washington aqueduct showing the condition of the work and the present state of the appropriations authorized and provided for by the act of July 4, 1864, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia; which was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 141) reducing the duty on printing paper, unsized, used for books and newspapers exclusively, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the petition of William Hughes praying payment for an improvement of the grounds surrounding Army square hospital, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 184) to facilitate proceedings in admiralty and other judicial proceedings in the port of New York, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

COMMITTEE ON CORRUPTIONS.

Mr. WADE. As there seems to be nothing else on hand, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of Saturday.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask what is the regular order of business before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. After the morning business is disposed of, the regular order will be the unfinished business of the morning hour of Saturday, that being the following resolution offered by the Senator himself:

Resolved, That the special rule of the Senate, No. 31, be amended by adding these words: "A committee for the investigation of the corruptions of the Government in all its departments and offices, to consist of five members."

Mr. DAVIS. I ask leave to offer an amendment to that resolution, which I desire to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no other resolutions to be offered, the next business in order will be the subject which the Chair has just stated; and to that the Senator from Kentucky submits an amendment, which will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment; which was to add to the resolution these words:

Which committee shall be appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate. Whenever there is a party political Opposition to the executive administration of the Government in the Chamber, the chairman and majority of the committee shall be selected from the Senators in such Opposition. And said committee shall have power to continue its investigations during the recess of the Senate, to send for persons and papers, and to adjourn from time to time and from day to day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Upon this resolution the Chair is under the impression that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. This subject came before the Senate unexpectedly, and I, having some suggestions to make upon it, was brought into the debate very unexpectedly; but as I have commenced, I will proceed with what I have to say.

I have said that I was utterly opposed to the creation of any more committees on frauds until we had dealt with some of those which had been presented to the consideration of the Senate. I hold in my hand the report of the select committee of the Senate that sat last year, and I will read to you the conclusions to which that committee came:

"An examination of the evidence has satisfied your committee that the Government has suffered as much by purloinings made directly by the chiefs of bureaus as in any other way. This fact is illustrated by the case of the purchase of a crank for the steamer Cambridge, an account of which may be found in the correspondence of Admiral Smith with the Navy agent at Charlestown, where nearly or quite twice as much was demanded by Lazelle, Perkins & Co. for the article furnished as it could have been procured for by the Navy agent in the regular course of business as regulated by law.

"At a time like the present, when taxes are so high, and the burden of the war falls so heavily on the people, they have a right to expect and demand from those intrusted with the disbursement of the public money fidelity, vigilance, and economy.

"In conclusion, your committee submit the following as the result of the examination they have made:

"1. In the matter of contracts for naval supplies last year the Government has been grossly defrauded.

"2. These frauds could not have been perpetrated without aid from those in the employment of Government in the bureaus.

"3. These remarks apply to the Bureau of Steam Engineering, the Bureau of Construction, &c., and the Bureau of Yards and Docks."

Not to be tedious, let me call the attention of the Senate to a single one of these cases, the case of the contracts for oil; and if the Senate will give me their attention for a moment, I think they will see that we have something to do before we raise any more committees to investigate frauds in that Department:

"One of the most remarkable features of these very remarkable transactions is the contracts for sperm oil, under the advertisement of February 13, 1863, at the several navy-yards, all made with H. D. Stover, of New York. At the Kittery navy-yard there was no contract; at Charlestown the price was $1 65 per gallon. Burnet Forbes was the next lowest bidder, at $1 70 per gallon. At New York the contract was awarded to Stover, at $1 68 per gallon; the next lowest bidder was Burnet Forbes, at $1 70. At Philadelphia it was awarded to Stover, at $2 35. The next lowest bidder was Seefeldt, at $2 40 per gallon. At Washington the contract was awarded to Stover, at $2 41 per gallon; the next lowest bidder was W. A. Wheeler, at $2 46.

Thus Mr. Stover took the contract for sperm oil at all the navy-yards at this letting, at prices ranging from $1 65 per gallon to $2 44 per gallon; and in no case does the price of oil as awarded in the contract with Stover fall more than five cents below the next bidder, and in two of the cases but two cents below, although the prices range from $1 65 to $2 44 per gallon; and what renders this coincidence the more remarkable is, that while several alterations in the prices are made, the one most significant is in the price of sperm oil delivered at New York, the price of which was originally put in at $1 40 per gallon, and subsequently altered to $1 68 per gallon, just two cents below the next bidder. Now, the committee with confidence suggest that it is hardly to be believed that it falls within the range of human sagacity for any man to be able so to gauge his bids for articles to be delivered at different places, differing so widely in amounts as these do, as to fall in two instances two cents, and in two others five cents, below the next bidder; and credulity on this subject is still further taxed when it is known that one of these bids, originally $1 40, has been raised to $1 66, still keeping the bid the lowest by two cents.

"It is worthy of remark that this alteration of the bid in this price of oil, from $1 40 a gallon to $1 68 a gallon, is very adroitly made by a careful erasure of 40, and 68 written over the place, evidently intended to mislead the observer, and done to induce the belief that $1 68 was the original bid; and the same, substantially, is true of very many of the other alterations before mentioned, though some of them appear to have been openly and boldly made. It is difficult to perceive why, if these alterations were honestly made, in good faith, when the bidder had a clear right to make them, there should have been such a manifest intention to mislead or deceive."

These alterations were pointed out by Mr. Smith, of Boston, who has had to suffer for it, I was going to say more than the Government: but they have been both pretty severe sufferers. The pamphlet of Mr. Smith pointing out these gross frauds was furnished to the Secretary of the Navy, and by the Secretary submitted to the several heads of bureaus, and they were asked for an explanation. They took a very substantial way of explanation: they denied the whole thing. Mr. John Lenthall, chief of the Bureau of Construction, said:

"The bids have been examined, as well as the schedule made at the opening, and, to the best of my judgment, there have been no alterations made further than in some cases to change the incorrect amounts from the rectifications made on the margins of the bids; and I do not believe they have been in any way tampered with."

Now, sir, I will give you the testimony of Mr. Lenthall's chief clerk:

"In reply to this opinion of Mr. Lenthall, that there had been no tampering with the bids, it may be remarked that Mr. Farwell, the chief clerk of Mr. Lenthall's bureau, at his examination before the committee in reference to a number of Scofield's bids, and of Lockwood & Collins's, which appeared to the committee on examination to contain so many alterations and erasures in the writing and in the figures as not to be worthy of credit, in that immediate connection testified as follows, namely: 'I desire to state, in this connection, that I recommended, at the time these bids were opened, that they should be rejected as being defaced and as being uncertain, it being doubtful what the figures meant; but these bids were all referred to the Department, and such of them as were awarded were ordered to be awarded by the Department. Collins's bids are of the same general nature all the way through.' Your committee are inclined to agree in opinion with the clerk rather than the chief; and so far as the appearance of those bids is considered, if they do not exhibit unmistakable evidence of fraudulent tampering, it is difficult to conceive what evidence would establish that fact. Indeed, it may be said generally of these bids exhibited to the committee by this witness that a worse exhibition of papers, for which any credit was claimed, never was made to any tribunal."

That is only one of a hundred cases. What was the result of this investigation? What was the result of laying these facts before the Senate? The witness through whose instrumentality they were made known, as I mentioned on Saturday, was immediately seized by order of the Navy Department, his store taken possession of, his private papers seized, his wife's desk and private papers taken, and he was sent down to Fort Warren and held there, and denied intercourse with his friends, under a bail of $500,000; and he was to be kept there until he could procure bail for that sum. Indignation beginning to be excited about it, the man guilty of this outrage consented, as I before remarked, to take $480,000 off the bail, and he was let out for $20,000.

I was asked, I think, by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] if Mr. Smith was arrested for giving this information. Sir, it is impossible for me to scan the motives of men; it is enough for me to deal with my own; but, standing here under all the responsibilities which attach to me, fond as any man of what little reputation belongs to me, careful of my word, I think, as most men, I aver before the Senate, before the country, and before God, that I have not a shadow of doubt that the sole offense for which Mr. Smith was arrested was the evidence that he gave upon this occasion. And in that connection I have a remarkable statement to make in regard to these tribunals. The man who ordered this outrageous arrest, the man who perpetrated this outrage in Boston, compared to which the proceedings of Turkey are civilized and the Inquisition is a tender mercy, being remonstrated with on another occasion against sending these cases to naval and military courts-martial, and being asked why he did not take the ordinary courts, made this remarkable avowal: "Your civil courts are organized to acquit; we organize courts to convict." If there was some friend of the individual referred to here to deny it, without stirring out of my tracks I would prove, by evidence that would flash conviction on every mind that heard it, that it is true as Holy Writ that this declaration was made, and not only made but acted upon. I will tell you how it is done, for, as I am upon this thing, I want to expose it.

You know that by the retiring law which we have passed—a law which I always voted against, I am very glad to say; and I am sorry that I did not succeed in defeating it, for it is nothing on earth but a system of favoritism—the Secretary of the Navy is enabled to employ any old men that get to be eighty or ninety years of age, so long as they live, provided they are agreeable and do such service as he requires of them, and to exclude everybody else that does not bask in the sunshine of his favor. These retired officers who have no employment except at the will of the Secretary, are put upon these courts-martial. The members of the court-martial that tried Smith were Captain William K. Latimer, Captain Charles Boardman, Captain John S. Chauncey, Captain Andrew K. Long, Commander Edward W. Carpenter, Commander T. Darrah Shaw, and Commander Thomas M. Brasher. I am not certain, but I believe that every one of them is a retired officer; certainly a large majority of them are on the retired list. These gentlemen, like other retired officers, are anxious for pay, for employment, and if they make themselves acceptable to the Secretary of the Navy they can get it; if they do not, they cannot. The court being thus organized, the Secretary of the Navy appears as prosecutor where the man is prosecuted; and it being known that the Department wants a conviction, there is nothing else for them to do but to convict.

In regard to this case, I want to read a statement for which the honorable Senators from Massachusetts and the whole delegation from that State in the House of Representatives are responsible, for they have signed their names to it:

"The proceedings have seemed to be harsh, vindictive, and unnecessary:

"1. In the character of the arrest of the Messrs. Smith, which was attended by circumstances of severity utterly unjustifiable.

"2. In requiring bonds to so large an amount as $500,000."

I think it was an outrage which deserves the severest condemnation of this Government and of the civilized world. When Aaron Burr was arraigned before Chief Justice Marshall, and the question of bail was raised in some of the preliminary proceedings which finally terminated in an indictment for treason, the bail fixed by the Chief Justice was $10,000. There may have been cases where larger bail has been demanded, but I am not now aware of any. In this case $500,000 bail was demanded.

Now, let me ask if the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States had ordered any man to be incarcerated until he gave bail of $500,000, is there a Senator here who would fail to record a vote for the impeachment of the officer who should order such bail? There may be, but I trust not.

Let me read a little further from this statement. They say these proceedings were still further unjustifiable in these respects:

"3. In the seizure of their books and papers, which are still detained, although regarded by their eminent counsel as important to their defense.

"4. In turning into a military offense what is more proper for a civil tribunal, and dragging these defendants before a court-martial.

"5. In transferring the proceedings from Boston, where the parties reside and the transactions in question occurred, to Philadelphia, thus increasing greatly the difficulties and the expense of the defense. This will be appreciated when it is understood that the witnesses are very numerous, and chiefly engaged in mercantile business, so that they cannot leave Boston without the neglect of their private interests.

"The undersigned, on reviewing these circumstances, which are so inconsistent with the administration of justice in its ordinary forms, have been at a loss to account for the spirit which has been manifested in the prosecution. If they look at the trivial character of most of the specifications against the defendants, they are still more at a loss. It is difficult to account for such elaborate and persistent harshness without yielding to the prevailing belief that other motives than the vindication of justice have entered into this case.

"The undersigned are not strangers to the fact that one of these defendants, in the discharge of what he believed to be his duty as a good citizen, has, by correspondence and by testimony before committees of Congress, been brought into collision with officers of the Navy Department; and there is too much reason to believe that some of these officers have allowed themselves to be governed by personal feelings throughout these strange proceedings."

I think so too. This man brought all the machinery of the Government to bear to crush this witness for the testimony he had given. Read the evidence, read the charges upon which he was tried, and I have no doubt convicted, so far as the finding of the court is concerned, because they were organized to convict, and I tell you, sir, you will be satisfied, and any Senator with an unbiased mind will be satisfied, that there is not a mercantile house in Boston, in New York, in Philadelphia, or in Baltimore, or anywhere else, doing a large business, that might not be convicted, if tried, upon precisely the character of transactions which are alleged here as fraudulent, and the evidence by which they are sustained.

But, sir, the thing does not stop here; they were not content with that; but, as I said when up before, a roving commission was sent out to Charlestown and Portsmouth to see if something could not be hunted up against the committee that laid these facts before the country. I think before the Senate institute any more committees or commissions to investigate fraud, they should at least vindicate their own body and see to it that those who are unkenneled and whose frauds are exposed shall not with impunity turn upon the Senate and see if they cannot find out something by which to attack them, thus constituting themselves a tribunal over and above the Senate. Sir, you may have as many committees as you choose, but can you expect to have a fair and honest investigation, if, the moment a witness testifies against one of these Departments, he is liable to have his private papers seized, his store shut up, his house taken, himself torn from society and from everything that society is bound to protect, incarcerated in a cell in one of your forts, and there held under a bond, the very enormity of which is calculated to paralyze the public mind, and to deprive him of the benefit which ought to be secured to every citizen, however humble?

But there is another fact in this remarkable case. This evidence has been taken, and what is called the "argument of the judges advocate," which I now hold in my hand, has been published and furnished to every member of Congress at the public expense undoubtedly, and I am told largely elsewhere, by this man. In this matter, which is put here for an argument—

Mr. DAVIS. Who was the judge advocate?

Mr. HALE. There were a couple of them. The humble individual who now addresses the Senate came under cognizance before this honorable court. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] is lit a small dab, because in the report on this subject he expressed the hope that the arrest of the accused, upon these charges,

"Following close upon his examination before the committee, will be fully justified upon due investigation and fair trial, and that the proceeding will be relieved from all appearance of persecution or vengeance."

So much for the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania. Then comes in another:

"And in this connection we feel bound to notice the extraordinary conduct of another member of that committee, who, with the evident design of prejudicing the community against the Department, and of influencing your decision in this case, was so imprudent as to make it the subject of a violent attack upon the Department, in a speech made by him at a public political meeting in this city, in which he indulged in terms of severe censure on account of this prosecution, which, under the circumstances, were in the highest degree improper, and altogether unworthy the public position he held."

I am greatly obliged to these gentlemen for their kindness.

"If he had been the retained advocate of the accused he could not have endeavored more earnestly and zealously to defeat the ends of justice by his attempt to prevent a fair and impartial trial of this case upon its merits. He knew that the accused was then on his trial before this tribunal upon the charge of defrauding the Government, for he was here under summons of this court to testify as a witness."

I do not want to characterize that statement any more than to say that it is absolutely untrue; there is not a word of truth in it. I never was before the court as a witness in my life. They did send me a subpoena, but before the time fixed for attending I received a telegraphic dispatch from the court saying I need not attend; and they forgot to pay the expense of sending the message, and I had to pay it myself.

"It was, in fact, a contempt of this court, which he knew was sworn to try the accused according to the evidence, and to administer justice according to law."

If that court should ever come together again and should be inclined to pursue this matter of contempt, I will save them all the trouble of evidence. I will avow here that I entertain the most profound contempt, mingled, I trust, with a right-cous indignation, against the court for the part which they were playing. Mr. President, this is one of the indications of the times of evil import. On the 17th of June, what was to Franklin W. Smith all the bloody history of Massachusetts? What were all the glorious principles that she had contended for? What were all the bloody sacrifices she had made in the preceding centuries of her history? What was Bunker Hill, on that day, in whose shadow he was arrested, but a monument of the patriotism of our fathers and the degradation of their sons, if such an outrage as that could be permitted? But it was permitted, and it has been persisted in with a pertinacity, an obstinacy, and a vindictiveness which I trust will not be repeated.

The proceedings against Mr. Smith in this case are in singular contrast with the finding of another court-martial in the case of Colonel North. If the same view was taken in that case in organizing the court as in organizing this court, and that is that it was done to convict, I think they must have received an intimation afterward that those who had organized the court had altered their minds.

Mr. President, it is painful to me to have to notice these things; it is painful to me to feel the necessity of it; but I do feel it, and God helping me, I will not shrink from it. I know it is imprudent, but I am an imprudent man. I do not want to be prudent. I will stand, and I will go out of the Senate as I came into it, the uncompromising foe of wrong and robbery and oppression. I shall have the thieves on my back. I have had them there a long time themselves and by proxy. They have hunted me. Let them hunt; and whatever they find let them bring forth. I invite the scrutiny of friends, and I defy the malice of enemies. I scorn them.

Now, sir, there are a great many other things that I have to say not exactly in this immediate connection. I will go on and say a few of them now, and I may take some other occasion to allude to the others. It is useless for me to deny, what is apparent to everybody, that for three years I have been the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs and this year I am not. There is a reason for it. The reason that has been assigned to me, and it is a satisfactory one, is that I am not "in accord with the Department." Sir, I wish that fact to be recorded. I wish that it may stand where every individual, however high or however low who has the least interest in the reputation of so humble an individual as myself, might know it. I am "not in accord" with them; and I will tell you one of the first things upon which I differed with them. It was in the beginning of this war, when the country was in a condition which we all remember, and which it is useless for me to undertake to delineate at the present time. When I saw the Secretary of the Navy employing his own brother-in-law to purchase ships, paying him a greater compensation than was paid to the President, Vice President, and all the members of the Cabinet combined; when I saw the Secretary of the Navy, without law and against law, putting his hands up to the elbows in the public Treasury and pouring it out without stint upon his brother-in-law, and paying him in a time of dire distress a compensation exceeding that of the President, Vice President, and all the members of the Cabinet combined, I was "not in accord" with him. I said some severe things—no, not severe; not half as severe as I ought to have done; God forgive me for my timidity on that occasion—but I said some things which several gentlemen have done me the honor to repeat once or twice every year since—the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] the honorable Senator from Oregon, [Mr. NEWMAN,] and others. I do not want to repeat them again, but if it were necessary I would repeat them. I have never repented of what I then did. I am glad that I did it.

There are one or two other things in regard to which I am "not in accord" with the Department. Every officer of the Navy up to within a short period who has distinguished himself, who has rendered gallant service to his country, who has illustrated the national fame on the deck of his vessel, has immediately fallen under the ban and displeasure of this administration of the Navy Department. There was Stringham at Hatteras, who let in the first rays of glory in this great struggle; who first caused our hearts to exult; and what was the result? He was snubbed by the Assistant Secretary, and soon laid upon the shelf.

Then there was Admiral Du Pont who at Hilton Head won the gratitude and admiration of the country, whatever it may have done of the Department; and what was the result to him? Read the correspondence; and if Admiral Du Pont had been found to be a felon, preying upon the public Treasury, he could not have been abused, in the official correspondence had with him, more than he was. What was that for?

Why, Mr. President, we have a remarkable genius at the head of the Navy Department; I do not mean the head; but I mean the man who allows his friends here to call him "the head," "the actual Secretary." I do not want to say anything about him or his history until he comes upon the stage of the Navy Department. I believe he had been in the Navy before, and had attained to the honorable position of a passed midshipman. He did not go any further. He was subsequently engaged in other employments. But about the time of the siege of Fort Sumter his genius beamed upon the world in one of the most absurd and ridiculous theories for relieving that fort I believe that was ever broached. It was thought at once that a man who had the brains to conceive such an absurd idea must of course be a genius, and we find him next practically first lord of the admiralty dispensing its honors and its favors.

Pretty soon after he came here it became necessary—I have not the documents before me, but I am speaking of history—in the opinion of the Secretary to build some twenty iron-clads of a certain description. In the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which I was then a member, the subject of the Morgan purchase was brought up; and let me here say once for all, though I do not wish to shirk the responsibility and I am willing to take all that belongs to me, it was not introduced by me, nor was the attention of the committee called to it by me, nor was the action which the committee took suggested by me; but still being so unfortunate as to be the chairman of the committee, it was hurled at me and I was willing to take it for I concurred in it entirely. We recommended by way of simple rebuke for this gross breach of public trust in the use of the funds of the Department, that the building of these iron-clads should be vested in the President of the United States instead of the Secretary of the Navy. You know the result, sir. We had several glorification speeches here, and we were asked, when Du Pont had covered the land with glory and Stringham had done so many great things, and our gallant sailors were winning such laurels, if that was a time to censure the Secretary of the Navy; and we let it go.

The twenty iron-clads were ordered to be built, and we waited some two years for the building of them. I introduced a resolution at the last session calling the attention of the committee on the conduct of the war to the character of these iron-clads; and what was their history? This new genius that we had got into the Department, contemning the wisdom of the chief of the Bureau of Construction, (and I think he was right in that,) undertook to build something upon the suggestions of his own genius; and I understand, though I do not know, but it is in the resolution of inquiry, that neither the Secretary, nor the head of the Bureau of Construction would assume any responsibility for the mode and manner and fashion in which these iron-clads were constructed. The subject was referred to the committee on the conduct of the war; and I should be glad if that committee would report upon it; but if they will not, let me tell you the result. The iron-clads were beautiful things. I think if they had had a fair chance they would have made more than nine knots an hour, but it would have been nine knots an hour toward the bottom of the sea. [Laughter.] They would not float; they were not worth the iron they were made of.

Well, sir, what then? The resources of genius are astonishing. It was then discovered that iron wash-tubs like these, taking off the turrets and the guns so that they would float, were just exactly the kind of vessels that Dahlgren wanted to take Charleston with; and so they went to work remodeling and remodeling. What is the history of that I do not know, but I apprehend I state it highly favorable to the genius who constructed them if I say that they are worth nearly as much as the old iron would be.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of Saturday.

Mr. HALE. Very well, sir; I will take another opportunity to-morrow to continue my remarks.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the consent of the Senate to amend the original proposition by substituting the term "transactions" for "corruptions," "transactions" being a rather more parliamentary term.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can so modify his resolution.

RETALIATION ON REBEL PRISONERS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 97) advising retaliation for the cruel treatment of prisoners, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. Wilson to recommit the resolution, together with all the amendments and proposed amendments, to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WADE. Before we proceed further, I should like to have read some depositions that I have taken this morning on the subject of rebel barbarities. I hope to put that question beyond any doubt.

The Secretary read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 30, 1865.

Mr. Albert D. Richardson sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. I understand that you are one of the newspaper correspondents who lately escaped from Salisbury, North Carolina. Will you give to the committee a statement of such matters as you may deem important in relation to your experience as a prisoner, and what you have observed in reference to the treatment of our prisoners by the rebel authorities?

Answer. I am a Tribune correspondent, and was captured by the rebels May 3, 1863, at midnight, on a hay boat in the Mississippi river, opposite Vicksburg. After confinement in six different prisons, I was sent to Salisbury, North Carolina, February 3, 1864, and kept there until December 18, when I escaped.

For several months Salisbury was the most endurable rebel prison I had seen. The six hundred inmates exercised in the open air, were comparatively well fed, and kindly treated. But early in October ten thousand regular prisoners of war arrived there, and it immediately changed into a scene of cruelty and horrors. It was densely crowded; rations were cut down and issued very irregularly; friends outside could not even send in a plate of food. The prisoners suffered constantly and often intensely for want of water, bread, and shelter.

The rebel authorities placed all the prison hospitals under charge of my two journalistic comrades (Messrs. Brown and Davis) and myself. Our positions enabled us to obtain exact and minute information. Those who had to live or die on the prison ration always suffered from hunger. Very frequently one or more divisions of a thousand men would receive no rations for twenty-four hours; sometimes they were without a morsel of food for forty-eight hours. The few who had money would pay from five to twenty dollars, rebel currency, for a little loaf of bread. Most prisoners traded the buttons from their blouses for food. Many, though the weather was very inclement and snows frequent, sold coats from their backs and shoes from their feet, yet I was assured, on authority entirely trustworthy, that the great commissary warehouse near the prison was filled with provisions; that the commissary found it difficult to obtain storage for his flour and meat; that, when a subordinate asked the post commandant, Major John H. Gee, "Shall I give the prisoners full rations?" he replied, "No, God damn them! I give them quarter rations." I know, from personal observation, that corn and pork are very abundant in the region about Salisbury.

For several weeks the prisoners had no shelter whatever. They were all thinly clad; thousands were barefooted; not one in twenty had either overcoat or blanket; many hundreds were without shirts, and hundreds were without blouses. At last, one Sibley tent and one "A" tent were furnished to each squad of one hundred. With the closest crowding these sheltered about one-half the prisoners. The rest burrowed in the ground, crept under buildings, or shivered through the nights in the open air, upon the frozen, muddy, or snowy soil. If the rebels, at the time of their capture, had not stolen their shelter tents, blankets, clothing, and money, they would have suffered little from cold. If the prison authorities had permitted a few hundred of them, either upon parole or under guard, to cut logs within two miles of the garrison, the prisoners would gladly have built comfortable and ample barracks in one week. But the commandant would never, in a densely wooded region, with the cars which brought it passing by the wall of the prison, even furnish half the fuel which was needed.

The hospitals were in a horrible condition. By crowding the patients thick as they could lie upon the floor they would contain six hundred inmates. They were always full to overflowing, with thousands seeking admission in vain. In the two largest wards, containing jointly about two hundred and fifty patients, there was no fire whatever; the others had small fire places, but were always cold. One ward, which held forty patients, was comparatively well furnished. In the other eight the sick and dying men lay upon the cold and usually naked floor, for the scanty straw furnished us soon became too filthy and full of vermin for use. The authorities never supplied a single blanket, or quilt, or pillow, or bed for those eight wards. We could not procure even brooms to keep them clean, or cold water to wash the faces of the inmates. Pneumonia, catarrh, and diarrhea were the prevailing diseases, but they were directly the result of hunger and exposure. More than half who entered the hospitals died in a very few days. The deceased, always without coffins, were loaded in a dead-cart, piled upon each other like logs of wood, and so driven out to be thrown into a trench and covered with earth.

The rebel surgeons were generally humane and attentive; they endeavored to improve the shocking condition of the hospitals, but the Salisbury and Richmond authorities both disregarded their complaints and protests.

On November 25 many of the prisoners had been without food for forty-eight hours. Desperate from hunger, without any matured plan, a few of them said, "We may as well die in one way as another; let us break out of this horrible place." Some of them wrested the guns from a relief of fifteen rebel soldiers just entering the yard, killing two who resisted and wounding five or six. Others attempted to open the fence, but they had neither adequate tools nor concert of action. Before they could effect a breach every gun in the garrison was turned upon them; two field-pieces opened with grape and canister, and they dispersed to their quarters. Five minutes from the beginning, the attempt was quelled, and hardly a prisoner was to be seen in the yard. My own quarters were a hundred and fifty yards from the scene of the insurrection; in our vicinity there had been no participation at all in it, and yet for twenty minutes after it was ended the guards upon the fence on each side of us with deliberate aim fired into the tents upon helpless and innocent men. They killed in all fifteen and wounded about sixty, not one tenth of whom had taken part in the attempt, many of whom were ignorant of it until they heard the guns.

Deliberate, cold-blooded murders of peaceable men, where there was no pretense that they were breaking any prison regulation, were very frequent. On October 16, Lieutenant Davis, of the one hundred and fifty-fifth New York Infantry, was thus shot dead by a guard who, the day before, had been openly swearing that he would "kill some damned Yankee yet." November 6, Luther Conrad, of the forty-fifth Pennsylvania Infantry, a delicious patient from one of the hospitals, was similarly murdered. November 30, a chimney in one of the hospitals fell down, crushing several men under it. Orders were immediately given to the guard to let no one approach the building, on the pretext that there might be another insurrection. Two patients from that hospital had not heard the order, and were returning to their quarters, when I saw a sentinel on the fence, within twenty feet of them, without challenging them, raise his piece and fire, killing one and wounding the other. Major Gee, at the time, was standing immediately beside the sentinel, who must have acted under his direct orders. December 16, Moses Smith, of the seventh Maryland (colored) Infantry, while standing beside my quarters, searching for scraps of food from the sweepings of the cook house, was shot through the head. There were very many similar murders. I never knew any pretense ever made of investigation, or punishing them. Our lines were never safe for one moment. Any sentinel, at any hour of the day or night, could deliberately shoot down any prisoner, or into any group of prisoners, black or white, and he would not even be taken off his post for it.

Nearly every week an officer came into the prison to recruit for the rebel army. Sometimes he offered bounties; always he promised good clothing and abundant food. Between twelve and eighteen hundred of our men enlisted in two months. I was repeatedly asked by prisoners, sometimes with tears in their eyes, "What shall I do? I don't want to starve to death; I am growing weaker daily; if I stay here I shall follow my comrades to the hospital and death-house; if I enlist, I may live until I can escape."

I had charge of the clothing left by the dead, and reissued it to the living. I distributed articles of clothing to more than two thousand prisoners; but when I escaped there were fully five hundred without a shoe or a stocking, and more yet with no garment above the waist, except one blouse or one shirt. Men came to me frequently, upon whom the rebels when they captured them had left nothing whatever except a light cotton shirt and a pair of light ragged cotton pantaloons.

The books of all the hospitals were kept and the daily consolidated reports made up under my supervision. During the two months between October 18 and December 18, the average number of prisoners was about seven thousand five hundred. The deaths for that period were fully fifteen hundred, or twenty per cent. of the whole. I brought away the names of more than twelve hundred of the dead; some of the remainder were never reported; the others I could not procure on the day of my escape without exciting suspicion. As the men grew more and more debilitated, the percentage of deaths increased. I left about six thousand five hundred remaining in the garrison, December 18, and they were dying then at the average rate of twenty-eight a day, or thirteen per cent. a month.

The simple truth is that the rebel authorities are murdering our soldiers at Salisbury by cold and hunger, while they might easily supply them with ample food and fuel. They are doing this systematically, and I believe intentionally, for the purpose of either forcing our Government to an exchange or forcing our prisoners into the rebel army.

I will also, with the consent of the committee, lay before them a sworn affidavit I obtained in Louisville, Kentucky, from one of the prisoners at Salisbury, North Carolina, who escaped at the time I did. It is as follows:

I am a man by profession, and reside at Mystic River, Connecticut; was master of the bark Texana, captured and burned by the rebels near the mouth of the Mississippi river June 10, 1863; was confined in Richmond, Virginia, until the 20th of July, 1864, when I was sent to the military prison at Salisbury, North Carolina, and kept there until my escape on the 18th of December last. After the transfer of prisoners of war to Salisbury in October last I mingled with them constantly, and was familiar with their treatment in all respects. For a month before my escape

I was ward master of one of the largest hospitals in the prison. The prisoners were in a most pitiable condition. They all, without exception, and at all times, suffered greatly for want of food, the most of them for want of clothing, and a large portion of them for want of shelter. Very few out of the whole number were in good health, and the deaths were very numerous. Mine was called a ward for convalescents. It usually contained from a hundred to a hundred and twenty inmates. The deaths averaged fully six per day, and sometimes reached ten and twelve. The sickness and mortality were directly traceable to hunger, exposure, and cold. I can give no just idea in this brief statement of the horrors of the prison and hospitals and the general treatment of the prisoners. It is barbarous beyond anything I ever before saw or heard of. I believe it is the deliberate intention of the rebel authorities to leave the prisoners no alternative between freezing and starvation or enlistment in the rebel army.

J. H. CLEMENT,

Justice of the Peace, Jefferson County.

WASHINGTON, January 30, 1865.

Mr. Junius Henri Browne sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. I understand that you were a prisoner at Salisbury, North Carolina, and escaped at the same time Mr. Richardson, who has just testified, made his escape. You have heard his testimony. Will you state whether you concur with him in what he has stated, and also give such additional statements as you may deem necessary?

Answer. I concur with Mr. Richardson in all his statements, so far as the facts to which they relate came to my knowledge. In addition to what he has said, I would further state that I am a journalist by profession; have been since the breaking out of the war an Army correspondent of the New York Tribune; was captured in that capacity in the middle of the Mississippi river while running the batteries of Vicksburg on the night of May 3, 1863, our expedition having been destroyed by the rebel siege guns. I was held prisoner some twenty months, having, in that time, been an occupant of seven southern prisons, the last being the Salisbury, North Carolina, penitentiary, where I was kept with my collaborer, Albert D. Richardson, for almost eleven months, making my escape therefrom in his company on the night of December 18, 1864.

The treatment of our prisoners was had enough everywhere; but it was so barbarous and inhuman at Salisbury for two months previous to my escape that I regard the exposure thereof a duty I owe to the thousands who still remain there. Early in October, from nine to ten thousand of our enlisted men were sent to Salisbury from Richmond and other points; and as they had been robbed of their clothing and blankets, and received very little food or shelter, the mortality among them became almost immediately wide-spread and alarming.

Every tenement within the prison limits was converted into a hospital, and I offered my services as medical dispenser and assistant to the rebel surgeons. I soon made daily visits to the sick, who could not obtain admission to the overcrowded hospitals, lying in tents on the ground without covering, and with very scant raiment, and living in holes they had dug in the earth, or under buildings where they had crept for protection from the cold rains, the snow, and the biting winds, and performed such poor service as lay in my limited power. Their condition was distressing in the extreme. They had no means of keeping warm except by fires of very green wood that filled the rude shelters with bitter smoke, and which, added to the carbonic acidized atmosphere from so many breaths, and the emanations from unwholesome and unwashed bodies, packed together like fish, entirely poisoned the air, and destroyed the health of almost all who inhaled it.

The sickness and mortality in those outside quarters, as well as elsewhere, continually increased, and the marvel was that any one survived. Starved and freezing, with hardly water enough to drink, much less to wash their persons or the scant clothes they wore, the poor fellows naturally and necessarily despaired, and not a few of them were anxious to die to escape from the slow torture of their situation.

I had the best means of knowing; and it is my firmest belief that out of eight or nine thousand prisoners at Salisbury there were not at any time five hundred of them in sound health—an opinion in which all the rebel surgeons to whom I expressed it fully coincided.

The deaths during the last two months I passed at Salisbury ranged from twenty-five to forty-five per day, diarrhea, dysentery, catarrh, pneumonia, and typhoid fever—all engendered by scarcity of food, shelter, and raiment—being the principal diseases. I have no doubt if the prisoners had been properly treated—as prisoners of war in the North are to the best of my knowledge and information treated—the mortality in Salisbury would not have been more than one eighth of what it was, a view in which the rebel surgeons with whom I talked fully concurred.

The capacity of the so-called hospitals, nine in number, which were without any of the comforts or concomitants of those institutions, was not to the fullest over five or six hundred patients; and the number of prisoners who ought to have been inmates thereof was at least as many thousand. The hospitals merely afforded some protection from the cold and rain, and furnished rather better rations than were given to the men who were supposed by a transparent fiction to be in good health. Hardly any one would go to the hospitals so long as he could help himself, or induce any one to help him, the daily spectacle of ghastly and hideous corpses going therefrom to the dead-house filling all beholders with horror, and inducing the soldiers to believe that all who entered those filthy and pestiferous tenements were doomed.

The prison limits at Salisbury revealed a scene of wretchedness, squalor, despair, and suffering such as I—accustomed as I am to Army life and the horrors of military hospitals and battle-fields—had never before witnessed. The prison authorities—especially after the massacre attending the attempted outbreak of November 25—appeared not only indifferent to the miserable condition of the men, but to be actuated by a brutality and malignity toward them that I could not reconcile with my ideas of human nature. They permitted the guards to shoot prisoners whenever they pleased, without the least pretext or explanation; and no man's life was safe for a day or an hour. The air was full of pain and pestilence, and all the horrors of imagined hells seemed realized in that most wretched place, of which I shall never think without a shudder and an augmented faith in the naturally abhorrent doctrine of total depravity.

Mr. HARLAN. In this connection I ask to have read at the desk an official paper signed by V. Bossieux, lieutenant and acting adjutant in the rebel service, addressed to Sergeant John Wilkin, sergeant in charge of a confederate States military hospital at Belle Isle, Richmond. It is a very brief document. It was handed to me this morning by Colonel Boyd, who is serving on General Schofield's staff, and was handed to him by Lieutenant Robinson, of the thirty-fourth Illinois volunteers, serving on Colonel Mitchell's staff, commanding a brigade in the fourteenth Army corps.

Both of these officers have been a long time prisoners at Richmond, on this island. One of them was appointed by the rebel authorities as superintendent for the distribution of company stores; the other, Lieutenant Robinson, was appointed a clerk at headquarters, and assigned to the duty of filing papers that came in to the superintending sergeant. Of course he was compelled to read the papers in order to make proper indorsements on filing them. Among them he read this one, and deeming it important that something official should come to the notice of the Government here of the spirit that prompted those officers, he sewed it up in the inner lining of his blouse, and in this way preserved it when he made his escape.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the paper will be read.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it in the handwriting of the man?

Mr. HARLAN. Colonel Boyd knows it to be in the handwriting of the officer who purports to have signed it; there is a memorandum showing it to be such.

The Secretary read, as follows:

BELL ISLAND Nov 15 63

Sir I am happy to inform you that we have sent Moal Hunting 61 Yankees, three shot and one Drowned. Those shot and Drowned I dont think Dr Ingraham can take any Credit for, and think they should be Credit to me, the rest Can be Credit to the Dr.

Wee only Planted one from 20 June to 1st Sepr I think wee have been Making up for Lost time to Sergt JOHN WILKIN Sergt in charge C. S. Mil. Hos.

Very Respectfully Your Obt Servt V BOSSIEUX

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. President, I have no desire to prolong this debate, or to occupy the time of the Senate in further discussing the merits of this resolution. Much time has already been expended in the argument of the question; and the whole subject of adopting retaliatory measures in order to enforce more humane treatment of our Union soldiers who are held by the rebels as prisoners of war has been so ably treated on both sides that it is idle for me to attempt further to discuss it. If any argument were necessary, the papers which have been read here this morning are enough to satisfy any one of the correctness and the propriety of adopting this proposition. But as I intend to support this resolution, and as it has been assailed with great power and earnestness by many upon this floor for whom I entertain the most profound respect, and with whom I have generally acted on all great measures pertaining to this war, I deem it proper that I should state the reasons which will govern me in the vote I am about to give.

If I understand correctly the argument of those who oppose this measure, it is this: the rebel authorities, they tell us, have treated and are still treating our soldiers held by them as prisoners of war in the most inhuman manner. They have deprived them of sufficient food and clothing to protect them from death; and in consequence of their cruel and inhuman treatment of these brave men more than thirty thousand have already gone to their graves. Then they tell us that this action of the rebels exhibits a refinement of tyranny and barbarism which this great nation cannot adopt or emulate; we are warned against it; we are told that we cannot take a step so directly at variance with every principle of Christianity, and of international law. But, sir, it appears to me that this whole argument is based upon the assumption that if the Government of the United States act upon the suggestions contained in this resolution we shall be obliged to take thirty thousand of their men out of our prisons and starve them to death, because they have starved thirty thousand of our men to death. If this be so, I can see the force of the argument of honorable Senators against this proposition; but I do not so understand it. I do not understand that this proposition would require the Government of the United States to punish innocent men because wicked men have punished our soldiers, for the mere purpose of retaliation alone; but I suppose this measure of retaliation is adopted, like all other measures of the kind, in order to force these barbarians in the future to treat our men with more kindness and humanity than they have done in the past. I do not suppose that when the Government took Colonel Lee, if you please, and another man, and then informed Jefferson Davis that if he shot the two captains who had been drawn by lot in Richmond, they would be shot, that measure was adopted in any spirit of revenge toward those two perhaps gallant and generous and respectable officers; but it was done for the purpose of preventing a great crime and barbarity on the part of the rebel government, and for that alone; and it had the desired effect. There was no inhumanity in it.

Now, sir, if we adopt this measure we adopt it as an act of self-defense alone, as a great necessity in order to prevent the further barbarity of the rebel government and authorities against our soldiers. Why, sir, the horrid nature of their treatment of our prisoners has been detailed in the testimony read to-day, and if we stand here as we have stood for the last eighteen months while this murder has been going on, while this starvation has been going on, and while our men have been going down to their graves at the rate, in some instances, of four or five thousand a month, in my judgment we are recreant to every duty that we owe to our country and to its brave defenders. At Andersonville alone, in the months of July and August, out of thirty-five thousand prisoners, eight thousand died from starvation and from exposure.

Now, I can say to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] that I do not vote for this resolution for the purpose of starving eight thousand men as a punishment for the starvation of those eight thousand who died in July and August, but I would select out their officers from the rebel prisoners, and I would notify the rebel government thus: "It is for you to determine the question; if you starve our men, remember that you starve your own; and if our men must go down to their graves under this terrible torture, so your men must follow likewise." We do not wish to see these things transpire in our country. The advocates of this proposition urge it in no spirit of vengeance toward these men, but simply for the protection of our own friends, our own soldiers. I think I can see a marked distinction between the case that is presented by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts and other gentlemen on the other side, a marked distinction between punishing men out of a spirit of revenge and adopting a policy such as this resolution contemplates, of selecting a certain number of men and leaving it for the rebel authorities to determine what shall be the fate of their men as well as of ours. We put them upon the same footing that our men are placed, and we leave the whole question of life or death, the whole question of civilization or barbarity, the whole question of suffering and of death, with the rebel authorities themselves. We propose to say to them: "If you wish to carry out this barbarous and inhuman treatment to our soldiers held by you, we regret it; we have begged of you not to do it; we have tried for a year and a half to induce you to permit us to feed our prisoners; you have refused to do it, and now this issue is left with you."

As I said before, I regard this as a great necessity; and, sir, there are times in the affairs of men when the necessity of the case requires them to resort to measures which, under other circumstances, would have seemed abhorrent to them. What will an individual not do in such an extremity as this? What would not one of these starved prisoners do to relieve himself from this suffering? There is no act so terrible that he would not be justified in committing in order to relieve himself from this terrible punishment. And if it is justifiable in an individual to relieve himself from such a condition of things, I ask whether it is not right for a great Government, when thirty thousand of its men have already gone down to their graves under the influences of this cruel and inhuman treatment, to act according to the necessity of the case.

Mr. President, as was said the other day on this floor, the people of the United States owe everything to these men. They are the defenders of this Government. They are the men who have left pleasant homes and sacrificed all the endearments of life in order to defend and uphold this Government. For eighteen months they have been subjected to this terrible brutality of the enemy. They have looked to Congress; they have looked in vain to the executive department of the Government, and their families at home have been looking to the Government for the protection which this resolution contemplates. They know very well that there is power in the Government to release them by force from these prison-houses. They know very well that we are holding seventy-eight thousand rebel prisoners in our hands who are living in comparative luxury at the North. All this they know, and they think it strange indeed that Congress and the Executive Government will sit by and see these men receiving daily many articles which may be classed among the delicacies of life, while they themselves are in a suffering and starving condition in southern prison-houses. Our prisoners know this; and do you suppose that they will be indifferent while we remain quiet here, and open not our mouths for fear of violating some principle of international law or some refined principle of the Christian religion—not a very common-sense idea of the Christian religion, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] said the other day; but if from some refined notion of that religion we are to sit here and do nothing while our men starve by the thousand and go down daily to their graves from cruelty and neglect, shall we not be held answerable?

Sir, I do not suppose there is a man here who entertains an unkind feeling toward any of the rebel prisoners in our hands. I do not suppose there is a Christian gentleman in the United States who wishes, for the mere purpose of punishment alone, to inflict this barbarity upon any rebel soldier. I certainly do not; but I say that it is better sometimes that men should be sacrificed than that a great wrong should be permitted, such as is exhibited by the conduct of the rebel authorities toward our prisoners in their hands. As I said before, I support this resolution as a measure of self-defense, as a great measure of necessity; and where necessity exists it overrides all other laws.

Who can read these affidavits, who can read that rebel paper which was handed in by the Senator from Iowa, and not think that this necessity is such as to require any act and every act on the part of this Government which may be resorted to in order to stop this cruelty? If I understand correctly the purport of this resolution and its whole intent and meaning, it is, that we shall inform the rebel authorities that from this time onward, henceforth, as long as they treat our men in this way, we will treat their own men in the same way. The issue is with them and not with us. We leave it for them to say whether this wholesale starvation and suffering shall go on, or whether it shall terminate at once.

For this reason, Mr. President, I support the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to recommit the joint resolution, with the various amendments proposed, to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have felt very unwilling to participate in this debate. Gentlemen of great experience and learning have debated the question so fully that it would seem to be unnecessary for me to say anything, but I desire to assign as briefly as I can the reasons for the course which I shall deem it my duty to take in reference to this question.

That we may avoid all controversy on some points, I state at once that I think the rebels have treated our soldiers who have been prisoners in their hands with great barbarity. That point I do not propose to discuss. Starting from that point, however, I think this is a question over which the military authorities have ample and sufficient power. On turning to the legislation of Congress, I apprehend you will find but a single precedent of retaliation by legislation.

Mr. WADE. Two.

Mr. RICHARDSON. When the act of 1799 was passed, we were not at war; armies were not in the field as belligerents, though it is true war was threatened and was impending, but it did not occur. In that case, probably, the action of Congress was necessary. But in this case, what power does this action of Congress propose to confer upon the military authorities? None. They have ample power to retaliate wherever the laws of war justify it. General Grant did not hesitate to notify the rebel commander that he would place their prisoners in the front of battle when our prisoners were so placed by them. I apprehend that if you will turn to the precedents you will find that our generals in the field have exercised the power in every instance where they deemed it necessary.

Now, Mr. President, I am one of those who do not believe that it becomes this nation to resort to all the means that may be resorted to by the Power with which we may be at war. We have recently had an Indian war. Indians burn at the stake the prisoners whom they capture. Would this Congress or this country be justified in subjecting prisoners captured from them to the same treatment? Do we not tarnish our reputation and our fame when we resort to the same barbarities that those with whom we are at war practice?

Why not leave this question with our commanders in the field and with the President of the United States? Do Senators say that Congress must necessarily act in this case as it did in 1813? I suppose the pretext under which the action of 1813 was had was that Mr. Madison was opposed to adding to the cruelties of war. While this resolution can confer no additional power on the executive authorities, because all the power that is necessary for the purpose is now in the hands of your commanding generals and your President, the Congress of the United States is called upon to adopt what? Measures that may place us in a situation subjecting our conduct to the criticism, and the just criticism, of the entire civilized world.

I can see no reason why we should pass this resolution. I know of no good reason that has been assigned. I repeat, the issue is not upon the fact of barbarities having been committed by the rebels; that is out of the question; the fact is too clearly established to be discussed. The question is simply and purely whether we, in this age of the world, will place ourselves upon the ground that we mean to resort to the same barbarities which may be practiced by any people with whom we are at war. While such a resolution can accomplish no good, it may do infinite mischief. It may do great harm and it can have no good result. I apprehend that our commanders in the field and the President of the United States who is Commander-in-Chief, will look into this matter and attend to it better than Congress can.

I am anxious to do anything that may tend to the amelioration of the condition of our prisoners in the hands of the enemy. I cannot tell why it is that prisoners are not exchanged when, as I understand, we have some seventy thousand prisoners in our hands while the enemy has only about thirty thousand of ours. It would be better to give the enemy two to one in the way of exchange. It certainly would be better to urge upon those who have the control of this matter to exchange all men as rapidly as possible, rather than to pass a resolution or an act of Congress that confers no additional power and can do no good. The condition of prisoners of war at all times and under all circumstances is hard. If the enemy does for our soldiers the best that he can do, their fate is a hard one while they are prisoners. The mode of life in the South is different from ours. The soldiers in our service are better fed and cared for than any other soldiers upon the face of the earth; your ration is larger; your clothing is better and more ample for the purposes of the soldier; and I am glad to see that the military authorities are taking the matter actively in hand and seeing to it that the men who bear the flag of the country aloft in the storm of battle are not cheated in anything that contractors have to furnish. I rejoice that it is so. If this measure tended to benefit our prisoners in the hands of rebels in the slightest particular in my opinion, I would go for it; but I do not see how you advance their interests, how you help their condition by passing the resolution. The main argument which has been made is that our prisoners have been treated with great inhumanity. That is true. But what is it proposed to do? You propose merely to express your opinion, not to confer any authority which is not now possessed by those who have control of military affairs.

Senators upon the other side have referred to precedents. They have referred to the precedent of the First Consul of France, and to other instances. Sir, there is no doubt about the power of the Commander-in-Chief to retaliate. That power is ample, and I believe it has been exercised in several instances already during the progress of this war. The authorities which have been quoted, so far from sustaining the side upon which they have been produced, are directly contrary to that view which was intended to be sustained by the Senators quoting them. When they quote the precedent of General Grant and other generals in our service notifying the rebels that we would treat their prisoners as they treated ours, they quote that authority in favor of the position which I assume, that it is an executive and not a legislative matter.

Now, sir, without being inquisitive, I should like to ask some Senators, what is the necessity for the passage of the resolution? Do you by it confer any power or give any authority not now possessed? If you do not, what does it amount to? Why the necessity for its passage? If you turn back to English history you will find resolutions and acts of Parliament passed during periods of civil strife and commotion, the only result of which was to tarnish the Parliaments that passed them without doing any good. It is that which I would avoid. I would leave no reproach upon the fair fame of this nation. You cannot plant this country upon the ground that you will act toward any and every people with whom you may be at war as they act toward you. If you do so you will descend from the high position and the high standard which this country has heretofore occupied; you will descend to a very low position, indeed. In my judgment, Mr. President, we are bound to maintain our position as a great civilized and Christian people in our legislation and all our acts.

Mr. WADE. I do not intend, sir, at this stage of the proceedings to make an argument on this subject; but as the Senator from Illinois has challenged the movers in this measure to show what good it will do, I feel bound to state what I expect from it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Senator will pardon me; I did not challenge any one.

Mr. WADE. You required some one who had moved in this matter to say what was expected from it, or something like that. It is a little too late in the day to charge those who are the advocates of this retaliatory principle with being barbarians or the advocates of barbarism. This proceeding is just like almost every other criminal proceeding. If a man commits murder, why do you condemn him and take his life before the whole world? Is it purely vindictive? Is it merely because he has taken the life of another man, and therefore you want to commit two offenses for one? Is it done for mere vengeance and nothing else? The Senator from Maryland [Mr. Johnson] argued at considerable length to show that this principle differed partially from that of ordinary criminal proceedings, if I understood him, because he asked, why do you do this; what evidence have you that they will ever repeat this crime; what evidence have you now that they yet continue in this practice? Well, sir, I hope we have succeeded in convincing even him that that which was commenced in barbarism has continued in barbarism to the present time, that they have not relaxed their inhuman practices. The burden of his argument was that we had no evidence before us that if they had been barbarians at one time they had not already repented. That idea of his was not in accordance with the well-known principle of law which declares that whenever you find a particular state of things existing, it is presumed so to exist until the contrary shall be shown. But the Senator from Maryland was very much troubled for fear they had altogether reformed, and that we should be found punishing by retaliation when there was nothing to retaliate. The answer would be at once, this resolution contemplates no retaliation if there is no offense on the other side. That is an entire answer to the whole declamation in which that Senator indulged.

But then, he said, it differs from ordinary criminal proceedings, because you have not the evidence to show that it is continued, or that this will be a remedy. When he hangs a man, when he takes his life for murder, what evidence has he that that really will have the effect of deterring others from committing a like offense? Can any man say that it will have that effect? It is the general understanding of mankind that it will; and that redeems the law from the accusation of barbarity and murder. It is the common sense of mankind that it will have that effect, and therefore it is part and parcel of the common law of all nations. So when there is barbarity among civilized nations at the present time, on one side the international law declares that retaliation by the other party is a remedy; that its effect will be to deter the first party from continuing the barbarity. It is on that reason that the law itself is founded. Why undertake at this period to argue against this common law, for the international law is part and parcel of the common law, and is so ancient that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary? That has always been the law of the land.

If a man has no sympathy for these barbarians, why are his nerves more affected by the proposition to subject them to the same treatment that they inflict upon us? Why is it that gentlemen's sympathies are all that way? You know from the evidence that these outrages are committed; you cannot deny it. The Senator from Illinois does not deny it. He is too candid to do so. He says there is no doubt about the fact. We all know that our soldiers to-day are subjected to all that barbarity can inflict upon them. We know that this day in southern prisons there are thousands of our brave soldiers dying by inches by reason of the barbarity of their captors and keepers. Gentlemen here know it, and yet they bear the misfortunes of their friends with great philosophy and great coolness. It is not the first time that men have been known to bear the misfortunes of their friends very coolly and calmly. But when you turn to the rebel, the accursed traitor who has already forfeited his life by reason of his crime, and propose to inflict upon him the same meed of punishment, not as vengeance, not for revenge, but to deter him from persisting in the barbarity that has already murdered more than fifty thousand of our brave soldiers, gentlemen's nerves are unstrung. They cannot stand that for a moment; but they can see with coolness a continuance of a system which is to-day reducing to the grave thousands of our men. They think that the honor of the country consists in our folding our arms under this state of things and turning to the brave soldier who is in the hands of the enemy and saying to him, "We are powerless, we have no remedy to apply for your relief." Sir, this is an imbecility which I never expected from the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to set the Senator from Ohio right. I said distinctly, and made an argument to show, that if the President of the United States and our commanding officers saw proper, they could at any moment give notice of retaliation or retaliate. They can now do either; they have the power. The point which I made upon this proposition is exactly and precisely that by it you do nothing. I object to it, not because I am not disposed to relieve our brave soldiers; I distinctly said that if I could do anything for them by my action here, I would do it; but I say you do not do it by this proposition.

Mr. WADE. Well, Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator, for I know his magnanimity, his feeling for the soldier—he has been in the field himself—if he thinks it is proper for this great nation to desert the men whom it has forced into the field and who have gone into these southern prisons? Has he any remedy for it? Would he not grant them any remedy?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly I would not desert them. The President of the United States and our generals have the power to retaliate tomorrow; you have not the power to do it; you do not propose to do it; that is the point that I make in the case. If the Senator will show me how this proposition will accomplish anything, I will go with him; but until he does show me that, I do not want him to say that I am not ready to do anything for the soldiers. On the other hand, I will go hand and heart with him in relieving them.

Mr. WADE. I knew that it would turn out so, from the Senator's generous disposition. I knew he would be the last man in this body to desert the soldier in the hands of the enemy, or to hold the doctrine that this great nation must turn its back cowardly on him and abandon him in the hands of the barbarians. He would not do that, and I would not. Nay, he would go further, and, for a remedy, he would exterminate every rebel in the southern States unless they let our men go, if that would have the effect. I have no doubt of that. He is not one of those Senators who have no blood in them and no feeling on this subject. He is a man; show him the remedy and he will apply it, for he sympathizes with the soldier, I doubt not. But he thinks we have not the power and the President of the United States and the officers of the Army have. Is that it?

Mr. RICHARDSON nodded assent.

Mr. WADE. I entirely disagree with the Senator in his constitutional argument. I hold that while the President has the power, we have the power to require him to do it if he does not do it. We have waited long for him to act. Men have been sacrificed until more than thirty thousand of our brave soldiers have gone down to the grave by reason of these barbarities unheard of in civilized communities. We have waited for him to act, as we had reason to expect that he would act. Does the Senator deny that, if he does not act, Congress has the power to require that he shall act? Have we not a right to pass a law saying to the President, "We require and demand of you that you shall put in operation this great remedy of nations, and that you shall interpose in behalf of our soldiers?"

Mr. RICHARDSON. If I understand the resolution, it does not propose what the Senator says we may require.

Mr. WADE. Yes it does.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think not.

Mr. WADE. It does direct the President to do it. I have not got the resolution before me, but the word used is "direct." The President is directed to do it; he is left no discretion about it. He has failed in his duty hitherto; he has left these poor men without a shadow of remedy; he has made no attempt to remedy the wrong. By the express consent of every lawyer in this body, except one, Congress has full power and discretion over the subject. Now, will you leave your President delinquent in his duty in this respect, and turn away again from your soldier and leave him in his jeopardy without any attempt to relieve him?—If you find that the Executive does not exercise his authority, and you have the discretionary power to compel him to do so, will you not do it?

The Senator from Illinois says that the officers of the Army in the field ought to do it. So far as I know, they are doing it to the extent that it falls under their cognizance, and I honor them for doing it. General Sherman but two or three days ago issued a mandate that if any one harmed the hair of the head of a loyal man in the State Georgia, or inflicted any injury on his army, he would take five lives for one. Nobody doubted, nobody denied, his authority to issue that order. Nobody has risen here to censure General Sherman because he made this great mandate. How is it that your nerves are not shocked over the barbarity of him who not only retaliates in kind, but demands five lives for one? General Burbridge did the same thing in Kentucky, thank God! and I honor him for it. By resorting to this great remedy he has put down guerrilla warfare almost entirely in that State—turbulent, outrageous, damnable as it did exist there for awhile. His stern measures of retaliation have had the effect to put down the accursed proceeding.

You have already been told how it happened at Charleston. When they placed our officers under the fire of our guns, we took a like number of theirs and put them under the fire of their guns. The rebel commander was no sooner apprised of it than he withdrew our officers from that peril, and when he did it we withdrew theirs. Was not that a perfect remedy? Was there any barbarity in it? Or would it have been better to leave our brave and patriotic officers exposed to the shot and shell of our own batteries, to be wounded and killed by our own men, without any attempt to relieve them? Some gentlemen here, no doubt, would not have done that. They would have thought that it would be horrible to shoot a rebel, but not very bad that a rebel should shoot us! Well, sir, it had its effect.

Again, in General Butler's department the rebels took our colored troops who had been made prisoners and put them to hard labor, which is not permitted for prisoners of war by civilized nations; they made them work on their intrenchments. General Butler no sooner heard of it than he selected a like number of rebel officers who were prisoners in his hands and he said to them, not "I am going to do this," but "I am doing it." He gave them no notice that he was going to do it; but he said to them, "I have selected thirteen of your officers and I have put them to work upon the trenches at manual labor, and there they will continue until you release our prisoners of war." It was done. They were put to the same work that their forces put our colored troops to. We know very well that colored troops are very objectionable to the prejudices of the rebels. If there is anything that a southern traitor abhors, it is to do anything for the benefit of a colored soldier. It was said that this was impossible, that the southern chivalry would never yield that their valorous officers of a high grade should be put upon a like footing with negro soldiers. But Benjamin F. Butler, God be thanked, had the nerve, the courage, and the sagacity to see the proper remedy at once, and he immediately selected a like number of rebel officers, put them in the trenches, at the wheelbarrow, with shovels, and said, "Work there;" and he immediately sent notice to the rebel authorities, "I have done this, and your officers will be continued on this work just as long as you treat prisoners of war in like manner," and the very next morning they released our colored troops, and we released their officers.

Then does it not have any effect? Sir, it is a remedy. The sense of mankind has known it to be a remedy, and so it has passed into the law of nations. It is the only remedy for such a case, and wherever it has been tried it has been found effectual. Thank God our officers in the field who know the malignity of these devils incarnate, who come in contact with them every day, have none of your squeamish ideas, none of your mawkish humanitarian ideas by which gentlemen here are actuated. They retaliate in kind. An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, is their doctrine; and so far as comes within the range of their duties they carry it out.

The Senator from Illinois asks, why not leave this matter to them to attend to? The answer is, because they know nothing about it; it does not come within the range of their observation and duty. The moment a prisoner of war passes out of their hands they know nothing about him; they have nothing further to do with his treatment; they know nothing about the treatment he receives. That is the reason they do not retaliate for this treatment of our men. If it was in the line of their jurisdiction, if it came under their observation, no doubt they would do it as quick as I or anybody else. But here is the place where we direct exchanges to be made; where we inquire into the condition of our prisoners of war; here it is known; from this Capitol the remedy must proceed in the case of prisoners of war. It is not so in regard to those who are misused in the very sight of our commanders in the field. In such cases, to the honor of our officers be it said, they have promptly interposed a remedy, and never without effect. My answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois is that the officers in the field cannot provide for this case, because they know nothing about it; it has not happened within the sphere of their observation.

We have taken the depositions which have been read to the Senate to show the infamous barbarity that has actuated the rebels in their heartless treatment of those prisoners of ours who have been placed in their power. Our generals in the field know nothing about it. It was not for them to know; it was for the Executive and for Congress to inquire; and we know what is the treatment which our prisoners receive. No man can plead ignorance of it. The Senator from Illinois has too much honor and magnanimity not to agree that the utmost barbarity and inhumanity have been inflicted, and are inflicted constantly; but he cannot see the remedy. The President has not nerve enough to come up to the mark, and say, "The soldiers whom I have called into the field shall be treated like men and prisoners of war when they are captives." I wish to God he had more courage; but I must confess that he has been perfectly reckless of his duty for a long time, and I am sorry that we have not been quite as quick to perform ours as we ought to have been; but it is better late than never.

Sir, with my consent, no soldier of the glorious Union Army anywhere shall be treated otherwise than as a man and an honorable prisoner of war without the minions of the confederacy being reduced to like condition. If it is so that they want to prosecute this war with barbarism, we can retaliate two or three to one; but if we show them that we intend to retaliate they will not attempt it. Retaliation has been a remedy wherever it has been applied; there is no doubt of it.

Sir, sympathy for the rebellion cannot stop it. Fellowship with the leaders, old acquaintance with them, high standing with them, raising them up as the idols of your idolatry, cannot save them. We are bent on retaliation for the protection of our own prisoners of war in their hands. It will come. You die hard, but die you must, and the soldier shall be released, and the Government shall protect him.

Talk not to me about the honor of the country. I tell you, sir, if any reproach and ignominy could be thrown on this great nation, it would be that we knew how inhumanly the brave men whom we have sent into the field have been treated by this contemptible foe, and have not raised our voice to prevent it. There is the dishonor. Foreign nations may be able to say to us, "You had not the spirit of a civilized nation, you would not apply the remedy which international law has provided; you turned away with heartlessness from your brave soldiers, and offered them no remedy, or you cruelly looked upon their torments and did not care for them." I thank God, sir, that I see at last that this great remedy is to be applied; and whenever the Executive Government, under our direction by this law, shall select from among the rebel officers in our hands as many prisoners as there are soldiers of ours in the hands of the rebels, and when Mr. Lincoln shall say to the rebel authorities by proclamation, "I have taken of your officers such a number as we suppose you have of our men, and have placed them apart to be fed, clothed, and kept precisely as you feed, clothe, and keep ours," relief will soon be obtained. Twenty-four hours after they know that will not transpire before every soldier of ours in their hands will be treated as a man and a soldier. No doubt of it. In every instance yet it has been effectual; and it will be effectual now.

I know something about these southern people. Habituated to slavery, with their hearts entirely hardened to the misfortunes and hardships of man in the person of the poor slave, they have forgotten that he is human and that they owe him any respect; and this hardening process did not stop with the slave, but the poor white man in the South is treated even at a greater distance and regarded as occupying a lower position of degradation than the negro. They do not care anything about the private soldiers. They would as lief we starved their private soldiers to death as not, unless they wanted them returned to fill up their armies. They place them side by side with the negro whose fate they care nothing for. It is not the poor private soldier that I want to see subjected to these punishments, because he is not responsible for this treatment, and because these accursed, hardened aristocrats look with as much composure on his fate as some here look on the fate of our soldiers in their barbarous hands. They care nothing for him; they have lost all feelings of humanity for those whom they consider the mere plebeian trash, whether black or white. But when you touch the chivalry, of whom their officers are composed, when you subject them to ignominious labor in the trenches, or put them on the same treatment which they deal out to our soldiers, my word for it their hearts will be reached and a remedy will soon be attained.

I have said all that I wish to say on this subject except to express the hope that the resolution will not be recommitted. It has been debated long enough. Every Senator has made up his mind exactly what he intends to do in regard to it. It cannot be said that a committee will mold the resolution into a shape more acceptable to the body than it is now. Nobody pretends that; and I know that those who vote for its recommitment intend thereby to postpone the time for the redemption of these soldiers, or do not intend that it shall ever come; they intend to prolong it forever. Let us be prompt; let us act at once. Every day is short to us, but it is an age to our poor starving men in southern prisons. Let us act at once, and not by long speeches and by capacious action delay the interposition of a great remedy in favor of our suffering fellow-men, the brave soldiers of our Army.

I hope the Senator from Massachusetts has already got tired of his amendment to send commissioners to treat with Jeff. Davis.

Mr. SUMNER. That is not my amendment.

Mr. WADE. No, sir, but the amendment of the other Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson,] and it is worse than yours, because you do not propose any remedy at all, [laughter,] and he proposes one that is not only no remedy but is absolutely disgraceful to us. I do not hesitate to say so. We have heard of our emissary going down there to beg for peace at the footstool of those scoundrels! As I said when I was up before, you have heard from him; he went to Mr. Davis and gave him his hand and told him that he had lost no confidence in him! That is the way we read it in the papers. He had lost no confidence in Mr. Davis, and Davis returned the compliment. "Hale fellows well met." [Laughter.] Is there nothing that will degrade a man? May he not steep himself in crime so deep that it is damnation and contamination to communicate with him? If so, is not Jeff. Davis that man? Before Almighty God, if war has brought suffering, dishonor, and death upon our people, Davis and his associates are responsible for it; and if a common murderer ought to die once for the crime of murder, Jeff. Davis's death ought to be multiplied a hundred thousand fold. Not only that, but think of the meanness that attaches to his crime. I was here when Jeff. Davis and company walked up to your desk, sir, and raised their hands to God, and swore to maintain the Constitution of the United States, and I was here when that oath was forgotten and they raised their accursed arm against this Republic, and, with all the power that they had acquired from it, turned about to destroy that very Constitution which they had before sworn to maintain. Is perjury no disgrace? And does not an honest, just man lose confidence in his fellow-man when he finds him steeped in perjury? It seems it did not affect Mr. Blair in the least; he had not lost any confidence in Mr. Davis. Sir, his touch was contamination, and communication with him was dishonor. He had perjured his soul before God, and his arm was tainted and reeking with the blood of the bravest and best of the population of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. How came he to go there?

Mr. WADE. How came Blair to go there? God only knows. I would like to know; yea, sir, I intend to know. If there is power in the Senate of the United States to be informed on that subject I intend to know why it was that any man was permitted to go with impunity through our lines and confer with the arch-traitor of the confederacy and come back here, and go again.

Mr. JOHNSON. He went in a Government vessel the last time.

Mr. WADE. Yes, I understand he went in a Government vessel. He had no more right to be on board that vessel on a mission to hold communication with this arch-traitor and devil than he had to be on his road to the lower regions in a vehicle furnished by the Government.

Now, Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts still persist in sending commissioners to kneel down at the throne of Mr. Davis and beg his pardon? Does he still persist in referring these resolutions to a committee that they may adjust a plan of communication with this accursed traitor? I say to you, sir, that the Government which authorizes anybody to treat with Jeff. Davis dishonors itself and dishonors the great nation it represents. What, sir, deal with this traitor? Did you not at Baltimore tell Mr. Lincoln that if he was reelected he was not to treat with traitors; he was not to make compromises with them; he was to trample them under foot, and treat only with the people who have been misguided? Sir, it is dishonor; it is futile to beg of Davis and company for compromise or peace. I know these men. They are high-spirited men, as the devil I suppose is high-spirited. After he went into rebellion I suppose he would not go back into heaven if they offered to reconstruct with him. [Laughter.] His pride would forbid it. He would say, "I took up arms against heaven, and it is my purpose to persist eternally, for if I reconstruct and go into heaven again I enter as an arch-traitor and perjurer before my God, and should be treated accordingly ever afterward." So it would be with Mr. Davis if he came back into this Union on any principle of construction that the President or Mr. Davis or Mr. Blair could get up. Let him come back here and what would be his condition? Would you associate with him? Would the Senator from Maryland take him by the hand, I should like to know? He says he would not now. Well, sir, can this man repent of such a crime as that which he has committed? If there is in politics and statesmanship a sin unto death as there is in theology, I say he has committed the sin unto death, and you cannot communicate with him without contamination and dishonor. He cannot repent of it. The blood of too many brave men is upon his soul for any honest man to take him by the hand.

Why does our President allow communication with him? No, I will not say that; but if he does allow it, why is it? I do not know that he does, and I hope to God he has not sanctioned any such thing, and that he never will sanction it. Send commissioners to Mr. Davis and the confederate authorities at Richmond! I say again, we cannot reach them. They hold their places there by usurpation. They do not sit there in council by the voice even of the misguided people of the South. Jeff. Davis sits there enthroned, because he has seized a military organization and compelled the poor men of that country to sustain him in this accursed rebellion to the ruin of all. They did not voluntarily go into it. Look at old Virginia, once the proud State of this nation, now trampled under foot and rendered almost a desert. She was not put in her present position by the will of her people. I have some feeling for that people, for in that convention which declared her disloyalty to this Union, and sought to break out of it, old Virginia's voice was suppressed. She voted against secession, in the first instance, near two to one; she was bullied by these scoundrels into it; her men were compelled into it. I have no doubt that whenever you break up this nest of vipers at Richmond, the people will flock back to the old standard with joy, that they may again possess that meed of peace and prosperity which they ever received under the flag of the nation; but you must first break up these devils; you must not disgrace our nation by treating with them; for it would be disgrace, dishonor, contamination in the eyes of our own people and in the eyes of the civilized world. I appeal, therefore, to the Senator from Massachusetts, for God's sake do not be the first to introduce a proceeding into Congress which shall propose to treat with these scoundrels. I know that Senator is as averse to it as I am. He has not well considered the effect of his amendment. He has not reflected that it will be a recognition of the confederacy when it is done. He did not think of the amazing depth of dishonor involved in proposing such a thing as sending commissioners to go down, stoop before Jeff. Davis, and beg of him to do better than he has been doing to these poor men, the victims of his barbarity. The Senator surely will not persist in it; but he will vote for the resolution proposed by us, which will apply the remedy recognized by the law of nations for the offense which has been committed.

I wish to Heaven the resolution was stronger than it is; but such as it is, it will be sufficient to require the President and demand of him that he take immediate action by way of retaliation, and persist in it until it shall be effectual to do away with this accursed barbarity. The Senate may do as they please, but I will never rest content in this body while there is a man deliberately by the confederacy subjected to this barbarity and cruelty. Until they desist, I will persist in my efforts to bring this nation up to the point where it will insist that the honors of a belligerent shall be conferred on us, and that the confederacy shall observe the principles of civilized warfare. If to accomplish this purpose it shall be necessary to exterminate every accursed traitor in the southern States, I am in for that, and I avow it boldly. I take the stand that a remedy must be applied; our soldiers can and must and shall be rescued from this jeopardy. Their services to the country demand it; our relations to them demand it; the honor of the nation demands it; and if my voice and my vote can prevail, this meed of justice shall be promptly awarded to them.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I did not intend to speak on this question; I intended simply to ask for the yeas and nays, and there leave it for each Senator to settle the question with his constituents whether he would protect our suffering citizens now in southern prisons, or whether he would leave them to the tender mercies of the rebels. I am daily receiving numerous letters from all portions of the State which I have the honor in part to represent. They are mostly of this tenor:

"I write to let you know the feelings of those who have lost friends in this accursed rebellion. There is nothing that grieves us so much as the starving of our soldiers who are in their hands as prisoners. Now, Mr. CHANDLER, a Government that will not protect its soldiers that have left good comfortable homes to go to war—a Congress or a Senate that will not protect them, are not worthy of the seats they occupy. I have lost two nephews in this war. They were starved to death."

This is written by a man who can hardly spell a word correctly, but he knows whereof he affirms; and the feeling is more deep and more intense than is appreciated by Senators on this floor. The people universally look to Congress for protection to these helpless prisoners now suffering the pangs of starvation; and, as I said before, I intend to call for the yeas and nays, and if Senators upon this floor see fit to permit a sickly sentimentality to induce them to abandon their suffering prisoners, let them settle it with those prisoners when they return, or with their friends who are here sympathizing with them in their sufferings.

Mr. President, when this war broke out we did not permit ourselves to believe that the rebels could be guilty of the barbarities which they have perpetrated; when the war broke out we adopted a conciliatory policy in its prosecution; we continued that conciliatory policy for years. Wherever our armies went at that time we not only protected rebels in their lives, but we protected them in their property. Wherever our armies went they fed the suffering rebels; they fed the families of those suffering rebels; and when we captured prisoners we administered the oath of allegiance and let them go. We continued that policy for years; and what credit did we receive from the rebels for this kind treatment of their prisoners when captured? They said that we dared not retaliate upon them, and that we dared not punish them. They credited everything to our fears and nothing to our generosity. That has been their view from that day up to this.

I saw the other day a captain who has just returned from a seventeen months' imprisonment in a southern prison, a gentleman from Michigan, and he told me that he was informed by the superintendent of their prison that it was their policy, their fixed policy, that no prisoner who remained three months in a rebel prison should ever be fit to enter the United States Army after his exchange and return home. If this was the barbarism of a single individual who happened to have a number of our prisoners in his charge, perhaps it would not be proper for us to adopt retaliation as a policy; but it has been proved over and over again that this is the policy of the rebels in the conduct of the war, their settled policy, their policy everywhere, in every State, with every prisoner.

The committee on the conduct of the war has been laboring for years to induce the Administration to adopt the system of retaliation; but the labor has been fruitless. A year ago, when that committee was directed to investigate the condition of the returned prisoners then arriving at Annapolis, we found that language failed to convey to the mind a correct idea of the condition of those men, and we were compelled, in order to give even an approximate idea of the treatment our prisoners had received, to have photographs of them taken, and to spread out the photographs of those skeletons before the people of the United States that they might realize the barbarities that had been perpetrated upon them. We then hoped and believed that the Administration would adopt, and adopt immediately, a system of retaliation that would prove efficacious. In that hope we were disappointed.

Sir, if I had my way in this matter I would tomorrow place every rebel officer in our hands upon the same diet and upon the same care and the same treatment that our soldiers are and have been receiving since the commencement of this war at the hands of the rebels. I would notify Jeff. Davis and the rebel government to-morrow morning that the rations of every officer of theirs in our hands would be one pound of corn meal ground in the cob, and one quarter of a pound of bacon, and that the bill of fare should be changed the moment they proved to us that the bill of fare for our prisoners had been changed; and my word for it it would not be forty-eight hours after that notification was served and after these rebel officers were placed on that diet, before the bill of fare would be changed for every Union soldier in their hands.

Sir, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] has brought in a sublimated specimen of humanitarianism that does not apply to these accursed rebels at this time. They do not appreciate that kind of humanitarianism. I expected those men who desire that the rebellion should succeed to oppose retaliation, and to oppose it to the bitter end; but I did not expect the Senator from Massachusetts to come in here and say that it was inexpedient to protect our suffering prisoners.

Mr. SUMNER. I have not said so.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator has not said it in so many words, but I will read what he does say. He says that retaliation "would be immoral, inasmuch as it proceeded from vengeance alone."

Mr. SUMNER. Read the first three lines of that resolution in my amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

And he is further resolved, That any attempted imitation of rebel barbarism—

Mr. SUMNER. That is it; "rebel barbarism."

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well; I will read the whole of it:

That any attempted imitation of rebel barbarism in the treatment of prisoners would be plainly impracticable, on account of its inconsistency with the prevailing sentiments of humanity among us; that it would be injurious at home, for it would barbarize the whole community; that it would be utterly useless, for it could not affect the cruel authors of the revolting conduct which we seek to overcome; that it would be immoral, inasmuch as it proceeded from vengeance alone; that it could have no other result than to degrade the national character and the national name, and to bring down upon our country the reprobation of history.

That is what the Senator says. He says it would be immoral and wrong to adopt the only system that will release our prisoners from those sufferings and that cruel death to which they are daily subjected. While I did not give his exact language, I used his sentiments, in my judgment. On the other hand, I hold that it would be not only moral but highly praiseworthy to place these rebel officers under the same treatment and on the same regimen that is given to our soldiers; and our experience from the commencement of the war has been that wherever we have adopted a rigid system of retaliation it has proved efficacious in every single instance.

When they took two of our officers in Richmond, and undertook to condemn them to death, we selected the son of General Lee and another officer and said, "Commence hanging whenever you please, and we will hang this son of your commander-in-chief." Was any hanging done? No, sir. When they took colored soldiers and placed them under fire from our fortifications, and we retaliated by putting an equal number of their white soldiers in the Dutch Gap canal under their fire, were not the colored soldiers instantly released? When they took fifty of our officers and placed them under fire at Charleston, and we took an equal number of their officers, and placed them under fire on James Island, how long did it take them to decide whether it was good policy to continue that barbarism to our prisoners? So it has been in every instance, and so it will be.

Now, sir, I do not sympathize with the Senator from Massachusetts in these humanitarian views of his. I believe it is in accordance with justice and with national honor thus to retaliate and to retaliate at once; and I believe the civilized world will hold us to a rigid accountability for not retaliating. They say already, "You have not dared to retaliate; you have permitted fifty thousand of your soldiers to be sacrificed because you dared not thus retaliate." Sir, I believe the country will hold the man to a rigid accountability who does not meet this issue, and meet it upon its merits, and meet it fairly.

But, sir, the Senator from Massachusetts goes further, and says:

And be it further resolved, That the United States, filled with grief and deepest sympathy for cherished citizens who, as officers and soldiers, have become the victims of Heaven-defying outrage, hereby declare their solemn determination to put an end to this great iniquity by putting an end to the rebellion of which it is the natural fruit.

Well, sir, I am in favor of putting an end to the rebellion at the earliest possible moment. I am in favor of using every implement that God or nature has put in our hands for terminating it at once; but meanwhile, until it shall be terminated, I am not in favor of allowing our helpless prisoners in rebel hands to perish by thousands because we dare not meet the responsibilities of the occasion. And again, he says:

That to secure this humane and righteous consummation, they pledge anew their best energies and all the resources of the whole people, and they call upon all to bear witness that in this necessary warfare with barbarism they renounce all vengeance and every evil example, and plant themselves firmly on the sacred landmarks of civilization.

Mr. President, vengeance has nothing to do with this just measure of retaliation. There is not a sentiment of vengeance in my heart. It is justice and simple justice to our suffering prisoners that induces me to cast my vote for this resolution. If I did not believe this retaliation would lead to a change of policy on the part of the rebels I would not vote for it; but in every instance where we have adopted retaliation hitherto it has proved efficacious, and I believe it will prove efficacious upon the end.

Mr. President, I had hoped this resolution would be passed unanimously by this body. I had hoped that this body would present to the country and to the rebels the spectacle of perfect unanimity in this just measure, and as I said before, I did not intend to open my lips in its discussion, nor have I done so until the present moment. If this measure shall not be passed, if it shall be defeated in the Senate, those who defeat it take upon themselves a fearful responsibility before the country. I say to the Senators from Massachusetts, if you take the responsibility of defeating this just measure of retaliation, upon your heads rests the blood of every single man who is murdered by these barbarities—not upon the heads of the rebels, but upon yours; and the country will hold you to that responsibility, and you cannot avoid it, because it is known to the country as it is known to this body that if we adopt this retaliation these barbarities will cease.

Now, sir, when this vote shall be taken I mean to call for the yeas and nays, and if Senators are prepared to go before their constituents and to justify themselves in saying that we owe no protection to the soldiers who have fought so nobly for years, but will abandon them to their cruel fate, I shall leave them to meet that issue and to explain it to their constituents as best they may. I shall take no such responsibility. I shall vote for this measure of retaliation, and for any measure of retaliation that promises to be effective. Ay, sir, I will carry it to the point of starvation. A Senator the other day put the question, would you carry it to the stake? Yes sir, I will carry it to the stake, and I will carry it to any extent that is necessary to preserve the lives of those suffering and helpless prisoners now dying by thousands in the hands of these accursed, hellish rebels.

Mr. McDougall. Mr. President, I am not disposed to enter into this argument. It cannot be made an exact argument. It belongs rather to the power of recognizing instinctive truths than to the fields of intellectual argumentation. In and about a question I cannot well argue, I will state. If through my statements may run a thread of argument, I may rather beg than boast as to all that belongs to what may seem advanced as argument.

Mr. President, it has been within the limits of my opportunity to have read something of that intense and terrible revolutionary movement, centering in Paris, and radiating throughout continental Europe, and popularly known as the French Revolution; to have read of Paris, France, agitated into madness; the fired caldron bringing like slag to the surface all the evil passions of mankind.

At the worst agitated period of that terrible episode in history there appeared a man, brought from out the cellars of Paris, a man marked in history, known then and now by the name of Marat. Marat et id represented the anarchy of their period. Marat first. Marat left this world before I remember to have seen the light. I have not seen him depicted by any artist. I have only in my mind's eye conceived the Marat. He is not remembered in poetry or song; he has been sufficient to add a black page to history. I never expected, I never wished, to realize Marat in human form. At first, listening to the fierce, savage, and terrible demands made by the Senator in charge of this measure [Mr. WADE] I could not but feel the presence of Marat, name him as you will, in this Senate Hall.

Mr. President, I will not attempt to reason or argue this question. Those who can make it a matter of discussion, abandon the base of true argument. They abandon their own consciousness of justice, the truth, the right.

The historian who shall write the record of this discussion, for it is an important one, in characterizing the qualities of this revolutionary period, in discussing the moral character of the American people, the North American people, if you please, their relation to humanity and to high civilization, will investigate the debate which goes into the records of the nation, and read what has been said by men calling themselves leaders of opinion, Christian men, waging war in favor of humanity, and reading this record, he will pronounce this judgment: "The great Republic of North America, calling itself the very representative of the highest civilization of the age, on this particular occasion was on the very verge of barbarism, and in council hall, in Senate chamber, proposed to realize the wild scenes that were spasmodic in the French Revolution, but otherwise have not been realized since the terrible wars of the middle ages." I speak not so much of the resolution as of the sentiments of Senators, which have more to do with the subject-matter, when I say that rules have been pronounced here which have been repudiated by all just, wise, true-thinking men for centuries—great men who have tried to elevate our imperfect humanity up out of barbarism into true civilization. It is to me—and I am not a sensitive man, but profess to be a Christian man—somewhat terrible to hear proclaimed such sentiments, opinions, and judgments as have been proclaimed here on this floor, particularly by the gentleman who has charge of this proposition.

In the name of liberty, in the name of humanity, and, through the clergy, even in the name of the Prince of Peace, we are invited to retaliate, upon whom? The one who has done the wrong? No, but upon any person whom we may obtain as a victim. In ancient times victims that were sacrificed were either fair animals, or else they were the outcasts of the land. Ever since the beginning of the Christian era this idea of victims has been ignored by teaching, by word of mouth, but not by acts and deeds, at least not by acts and deeds on the part of a great portion of those who profess the religion of the Prince of Peace. You take twenty or fifty or one hundred prisoners who in their own conscience think they are maintaining their just rights, and because wrong has been done to others of an adversary party, they are to go through privations such as were practiced in the dungeons of Venice, such as were known in Spain under Ferdinand and Isabella and Torquemada.

Mr. President, I have been taught to think that revenge is one of the qualities that pertains to Erebus and black night, and that revenge is one of the crimes that compels the ghosts of men to wander long upon the Stygian shore; but, sir, the Senator from Ohio wants vengeance. Had he not better remit that vengeance to Him whose vengeance is

*"Not like human ire,
Blown in an instant to a scorching fire;
But fixed and certain, though it long may lie Wrapped in the vast concealments of the sky?"*

The world has pronounced judgment upon the wrongs of past ages. The Council of Ten lies in the teeth of our period. Their wrongs were worked in the name of liberty and religion. We shall fall below those periods and justify a more emphatic condemnation if we, forgetting the lessons of the Christian faith, ignoring the lessons taught by Him, the highest, upon the Mount, call for multitudinous crucifixions.

There is a lex talionis; it belongs to the accidents and necessities of war. It is called for by the immediate occasion, and must be administered by the commander in the field, and he is understood to understand both the laws of war and of nations; were it otherwise he would not be equal to command. This power belongs to the Administration, to the Executive, and consequently to the war power.

Permit me to ask how you are to furnish a rule of retaliation to govern armies in the field? Can we here in our seats in the Senate Chamber furnish it? No. Can the President furnish it? No. The present occasion furnishes it, as it may seem a military necessity as between belligerents in the field.

The Chief Executive is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. We direct him to do an act belonging to administration and the exercise of his military authority.

Mr. President, I have not been pleased with some of the impingements of the executive upon the legislative department of Government. It is my more particular duty to aid in preventing the department of legislation interfering with the proper offices of administration.

Mr. President, I did not rise to argue; I did not rise to say anything that might be characterized as a speech, but that I love and am proud of my country; therefore I could not sit silent and withhold my oral protest against sentiments which, if they should obtain by the voice of this Senate, would entail a disgrace upon our period in the history of this nation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to submit a very few remarks in reply to a portion of the remarks of the Senator from Ohio. He has, I have no doubt, assigned the true reason, if there is any, for the passage of this resolution. During the presidential canvass last fall I said that the present President of the United States should not be reelected for the reason that he had failed to take care of our prisoners. I charged it upon the stump. They said I was a copperhead. I did not charge it as fiercely as the Senator from Ohio has done. If he were out in my country, and should make the accusation against the President which he has made this morning they would denigrate him the worst copperhead in the world. However, I do not propose to interfere in this fight. It is a beautiful sight to see brethren agreeing just exactly as they do here now. I have only to say in reference to this fight that I believe both sides are right, and I want to see the quarrel going on.

Aside from that, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a portion of the remarks of the Senator from Ohio, and to illustrate, if I can, by the very point that he called up, the correctness of the position that I assumed. The Senator says that where an individual has committed murder he has forfeited his life, and men take his life in vindication of the law by the law. Let me ask the Senator from Ohio, if a man poisons another and that man is convicted of the poisoning, do they in any civilized country poison the man who has been convicted?

Mr. WADE. Does the Senator want an answer?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly, I will yield for an answer.

Mr. WADE. I find no fault with the law that attaches to murder, by any means, either by poisoning or in any other way; but I said, and still say, that the object and justification of the punishment is not to be found in vengeance or vindictiveness against the prisoner, but, according to all the writers, because it is supposed to have the effect of preventing such crimes in the future. That is the justification; and it is just so with retaliation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Civilized nations execute the man convicted of murder; some in one mode, and some in another; but none of them metes out the punishment just exactly as the act was performed.

But, sir, the Senator says that Butler, and Sherman, and Grant, have given the notice and exercised the power. That is all that I claim.

Mr. WADE. They exercised the power and then gave the notice.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The argument that I made was, that Congress had not the power, and that the officers in the field and the President of the United States had. They have exercised it. They have the power to-day. You confer no additional power upon them by the passage of this or any resolution. I ask the Senator if he believes that the passage of this resolution will make the President of the United States act any faster than he has done?

Mr. WADE. I hope and expect it will. I have no doubt it will.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then does the Senator propose in every measure where the President does not go forward fast enough in the discharge of his duty to urge him by Congress? Is not this one of the powers conferred upon the President and the generals in the field, and restrained from Congress because it is conferred upon them? Have you the power to direct how the President shall exercise power conferred upon him? You have the right to pass laws. This is not a law; it is a mere resolution. You invite the President to interfere with your authority by interfering with his rights and powers.

My objection to the resolution is not to retaliation; but because it is a power belonging to another department of the Government, and not to us. Senators cannot escape from the point by saying that the rebels have committed great enormities in the treatment of our prisoners in their hands. I agree to that; but I assert that the power to retaliate is lodged in the Executive and in the generals in the field. If they fail to perform their duty, with what grace can the Senator from Michigan say that Senators will be held responsible for every prisoner of ours that dies in the hands of the enemy? If the President has the power and neglects to exercise it, and in consequence of that the responsibility devolves upon him, let the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Michigan, who elected him over my exertions and my efforts, turn their batteries upon him; and not upon me and other Senators here; let them not say that we shall be responsible to the country and to our prisoners for not discharging our duty. Those who have preceded us have not imposed the duty upon us; it does not belong to us; it belongs to the President of the United States and the officers in the field. Those officers have exercised it. The complaint here is that the President will not exercise it.

Mr. President, it would be, in my judgment, highly improper to pass this resolution after the remark made by the Senator from Michigan. The construction given to acts and resolutions by their advocates goes into history. The Senator from Michigan declares that he would starve man for man. This nation should not place upon its records an act which, according to the construction given to it by its friends, would place us on the same footing with a barbarous and savage foe with whom we are dealing. In my judgment it would be highly improper to pass such a measure as this; and I am therefore opposed to it.

The power of retaliation, ample and complete, exists in the President, and can be exercised. Why, then, does the Senator say that we are responsible? For one, during the thirty years of my political life I have endeavored to discharge my duty, and let the consequences take care of themselves; and with the period so near at hand when I shall pass forever from public view, I am unwilling now by any threats of responsibility to be driven from a position that I believe to be right.

The Executive has his duties to perform and Congress theirs. That this is a duty devolving upon the Executive is a fact well established, and it has been often exercised. I do not believe, if you pass the resolution, that it will help a single prisoner in a single instance. I believe that the resolution proposes to exercise a power belonging exclusively to the Executive, and I am therefore opposed to it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I regret that when the motion was first made by the Senator from Massachusetts to recommit all these propositions to the Committee on Military Affairs it was not at once done. I think the committee would have returned a resolution to the Senate that might perhaps have received almost the unanimous support of the body; for, although there has been much discussion here, so far as I understand the temper of the Senate and of those who have engaged in the discussion, all would agree substantially upon the passage of a resolution which shall conform to the precedents set by Congress heretofore, the Congress of 1799 and the Congress of 1813. If we look back into the precedent which was set us in 1813 we shall find that this question then arose mainly from the fact that the English, who were at war with us, took every means in their power to enlist the savages as allies in their cause, practicing all the savage barbarities which grow out of Indian warfare upon our inhabitants. President Madison called the attention of Congress to the subject in his message of December, 1813. He used this language:

"The systematic perseverance of the enemy in courting the aid of the savages in all quarters had the natural effect of kindling their ordinary propensity to war into a passion, which, even among those best disposed toward the United States, was ready, if not employed on our side, to be turned against us. A departure from our protracted forbearance to accept the services tendered by them has thus been forced upon us; but in yielding to it the retaliation has been intensified as much as possible, both in its extent and its character."

The whole subject of the conduct of the British in that war with us was brought up in Congress, and an act was passed containing two sections on this subject of retaliation. The words of the act are as follows:

"An act vesting in the President of the United States the power of retaliation.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all and every case wherein, during the present war between the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, any violations of the laws and usages of war among civilized nations shall be or have been done and perpetrated by those acting under authority of the British Government on any of the citizens of the United States, or persons in the land or naval service of the United States, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause full and ample retaliation to be made, according to the laws and usages of war among civilized nations, for all and every such violation as aforesaid."

The second section provides—

"That in all cases where any outrage or act of cruelty or barbarity shall be or has been practiced by any Indian or Indians in alliance with the British Government, or in connection with those acting under the authority of the said Government, on citizens of the United States or those under its protection, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause full and ample retaliation to be done and executed on such British subjects, soldiers, seamen, or marines, or Indians in alliance or connection with Great Britain, being prisoners of war, as if the same outrage or act of cruelty or barbarity had been done under the authority of the British Government."

These two sections were passed by the Congress of 1813, and I presume, notwithstanding all the discussion we have had here for two or three days on this subject, that if when the Senator from Massachusetts moved, after the first day's discussion; that all these various propositions should be recommitted to that committee, it had been agreed to, they could have, as he intimated when he made the motion, agreed, and agreed unanimously, upon a proposition which would have received almost the unanimous support of the Senate. But, sir, the debate has gone on, and some portions of the debate, and the spirit in which it has gone on, I, for one, deeply regret. I will say to my friend from Ohio that I regret that he should undertake to say that every man here who votes for the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts has no sympathy with our soldiers in rebel prisons, or that we have sympathy with the rebellion, or that we are not in favor of taking every means which the laws of civilized war will allow, to prevent—

Mr. WADE. I do not think I argued in that way. I argued it on the ground that they had lost self-respect more than any sympathy.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not know that what the honorable Senator now says makes his position any better. It is not for that Senator to dictate to me or other Senators on this floor the measure of his own self-respect. I say to that Senator that while my sympathies for our soldiers who are in prison are, I believe, as quick and as warm as his, while I am prepared to do all that the laws of civilized warfare will permit to rescue them from the prisons of their confinement, I do not yield to the dictates of frenzied passion in its declamations here, that would override the laws of civilized warfare, because it is avowed by Senators that if I do not agree with them and follow their lead I sympathize with the rebellion, and have no sympathy with the prisoners of the United States in the hands of the rebels. When gentlemen disagree with me in the course they pursue on this floor, I never impute to them an unpatriotic motive. I have no right to do so. I am bound to respect them upon this floor as my equals, and that they act from motives as conscientious, as pure, and as patriotic as my own; but while I do not assume to dictate to others, I, for one, am not willing that there shall be this assumed authority here to dictate to me.

Now, Mr. President, a single word in relation to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] The Senator from Ohio denounces the proposition that commissaries should be sent to look after our prisoners in rebel hands as an unheard-of thing.

Mr. WADE. Commissioners, not commissaries.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the word "commissar" is used in the resolution, it is evidently a mistake for the word "commissary," for commissaries are the parties that are always sent to look after prisoners, and not commissioners. The law of nations on that subject is perfectly clear. By the modern usage of nations, and so far as the law of belligerency is concerned, it would apply, and has applied, to the rebel prisoners as well as our own prisoners in rebel hands. We have already appointed commissioners or commissaries of exchange.

Mr. WADE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator says he has no objection to that. Then why does he denounce the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, which intends that and nothing more, stating in the resolution itself the purpose for which these persons are to be appointed, to go and look after our prisoners. The language of the resolution contains in substance that proposition. I will read from an authority on this subject:

"By the modern usage of nations, commissaries are permitted to reside in the respective belligerent countries for the purpose of negotiating and carrying into effect the necessary arrangements for the support as well as the release and exchange of prisoners of war."

Again:

"On this subject of the feeding of prisoners in the hands of the enemy, Vattel places the duty of a State to support its subjects while prisoners in the hands of an enemy upon the same grounds as its duty to provide for their ransom and release. Indeed, a neglect or a refusal to do so would seem to be even more criminal than a neglect or refusal to provide for their exchange; for the exigencies of the war may make it the temporary policy of the State to decline to exchange, but nothing can excuse it in leaving its subjects to suffer in an enemy's country, without any fault of their own, when the State has the means of relieving them from the misfortune in which they are involved by going into its service and by supporting its cause. It follows, therefore, that although a State may properly, under certain circumstances, refuse to exchange its prisoners, it cannot, without a violation of moral duty, neglect to make the proper and necessary arrangements for their support while they are thus retained by a captor who is willing to exchange them.

"It is stated by English writers that in the wars of Napoleon the British authorities regularly remitted the whole cost of the support of English prisoners in France to the French Government, but that the latter failed to make any provision whatever for the support of its subjects in the hands of the English, leaving them to starvation or to the charity of their enemies. If this be true, it is a blot upon the character of the French Government."

The appointment of commissaries, which I suppose to be what was intended by that resolution, is not subject to the denunciation of the Senator from Ohio. I do not know that I care whether a commissary be appointed. It may be unnecessary, as I understand some commissaries are already in existence, and perhaps they could perform all that is necessary; but what I complain of is that the Senator from Ohio assumes here to denounce every man who makes a proposition different from his own as if it were unworthy of him, unworthy of the Senate, unworthy of his position; as if it was an outrage upon the Government of the United States that he should propose such a thing as to have commissaries to look after our prisoners.

I have no disposition to protract this discussion. I do not care particularly whether this subject is referred to a committee, or whether we vote directly on these propositions. I understand the Senate, or the principal portion of those around me, to be agreed that a resolution shall pass which shall confer this authority of retaliation, or authorize retaliation within the rules which are practiced by civilized nations; but if the Senator asks for anything more than that, I certainly cannot vote for it. I tell the honorable Senator, when he is talking about the nerve of other men, that I have nerve enough to meet the frenzied passion declaiming here in favor of all the barbarisms of Indian warfare, that is ready to scalp prisoners and burn them at the stake; I have nerve enough to denounce it in the name of civilization as unworthy of the age in which we live, and I will never give it my sanction. But, sir, when restricted within the rules of civilized warfare, I am willing to confer the power, and that I believe is all that the Senate are prepared to do; what our fathers did in 1813, what they did in 1793, and what is proper for us to do now.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, as I listened to-day to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] and then again to the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER,] I thought the old slave-masters had come back again. I thought I witnessed all their insolence, and something more than their coarseness.

The Senator from Michigan threatened my colleague and myself with the yeas and nays. I tell the Senator from Michigan we were accustomed to face the yeas and nays before he was a member of the Senate of the United States. The yeas and nays had no terrors for me in those days, nor have they any for me now. I am ready to face them whenever they are called, and on whatever question they may be called. And I must say to the Senator from Michigan that I do not recognize his right to rise on the floor of this body and threaten me or my colleague with the vengeance of the people we represent for our votes here. We are responsible to them; we are responsible to the country; and above all and over all, we are responsible to ourselves for our own action.

Sir, I see no occasion for this excited debate, nor for the harsh words that have been uttered here to-day and the domineering manner that has been manifested. I regret it. It will have no effect over me, and I do not think it will have any over others. We were accustomed to meet such treatment here in other days. I think we had better keep it out now.

The Senator from Ohio takes occasion to denounce the simple proposition I made to send commissioners to make arrangements with the rebel authorities for the better treatment of our prisoners. The Senator undertakes to tell us that if we do anything of that kind we recognize Jeff. Davis's confederacy. No such thing. Why, sir, it is a simple proposition to consult with their authorities to devise a practical plan for the better treatment of our prisoners of war; a mere matter pertaining to prisoners, and has nothing whatever to do with the recognition of their government, any more than what has already been done in appointing a commissioner or a commissary, and I think we called him a commissioner, to deal with a commissioner on the other side, for the exchange of prisoners.

The Senator says I did not reflect properly on that subject. I tell the Senator from Ohio that I did reflect upon it. I tell him further that it has been with me a matter of reflection for months, and that the suggestion is not original with me, but came from the fertile brain of one of our own generals, through whose hands thirteen thousand of our own prisoners have been exchanged. That general proposed to this Government six months ago to take eight hundred or one thousand rebel officers to Hatteras, or Point Lookout, or some other good place, holding them there as prisoners, and notify the confederate government that the same bill of fare they had for our prisoners in their hands would be dealt out to their officers, and that plan was refused, I understand, by the advice of General Halleck. That same general officer suggested to me long ago that the condition of our prisoners in the hands of the rebels could be relieved by an arrangement; and his experience, I think, is this: in the first place, the rebels have not always all the means to make our prisoners as comfortable as we can and do make theirs. So far as that is concerned, it is their misfortune and not their fault. In the next place, the difficulty of transportation in their country, of carrying material from one place to another, has been largely enhanced within the last few months by the action of our armies, and that has counted against our prisoners. In the next place, he believes, and we all believe, and it has been proved here—the Senator from Ohio has been active in ferreting it out, for which he has always had my thanks—that they have not done all they could do; and further than that, in many cases they have intended to abuse our prisoners. I believe it.

Now, what was the simple proposition that I submitted? It was a proposition to send two commissioners, or commissaries, if you choose to call them so, to consult with the rebel authorities with a view to the better treatment of our prisoners, and to devise a practicable system for that purpose. That such a commission could do it, costing us, I admit, some money to carry it out, I do not entertain a doubt. In fact, a few weeks ago a partial arrangement was made with the rebel authorities by which they sent cotton to New York, sold that cotton, and took the proceeds and invested it for the relief and benefit of their own prisoners in our hands. General Beale, of Arkansas, a prisoner in Boston harbor, is engaged to-day in carrying out that arrangement on their part. General Hays, of Boston, a prisoner captured on the Weldon railroad, and a prisoner now, is engaged, I understand, on our part in doing something for the relief of our prisoners. This partial relief already secured has done more to alleviate the sufferings of our prisoners than all the talk and all the speeches that have been made in the Senate and the country; and I believe that if we addressed ourselves to that matter of humanity as we should, we could do a great deal to relieve the sufferings of our brave soldiers in rebel hands.

There is nothing inconsistent with that proposition in passing the Senator's resolution for retaliation. I do not oppose that resolution if the words "in kind" were stricken out of it. The resolution originally reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by the Senator from Michigan I could not vote for. That resolution, in its preamble, arraigns the rebels for barbarism and cruelty that would disgrace the devils in the bottomless pit, and then asks us to treat their men "in kind." I could not do it; I could not vote for it. I have not the nerve, and I thank God I have not the nerve, to carry that out upon any being that breathes God's air or walks His earth.

When this resolution came up, my colleague moved a series of resolutions by way of amendment. I moved this simple proposition in addition, which, I believed, if adopted, would do a great deal to relieve the sufferings of our prisoners in rebel hands, and I still believe it. But, sir, the Senator from Ohio moves an amendment to the original resolution—

Mr. WADE. Not the original resolution, but the committee's resolution.

Mr. WILSON. To the resolution reported by the Senator from Michigan—

Mr. HOWARD. By the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly; reported from the committee by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HOWARD. With your consent.

Mr. WILSON. Now, sir, the Senator from Ohio, on the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] consents to strike out the words "in kind," and to adopt the words "according to the law of nations." That changes the whole character of the resolution, and I say to him I have no objection to voting for it, and I see nothing in that resolution, as amended, inconsistent with the proposition that I have made.

I send to the Chair, and desire to have read, an amendment which I intend to move to the amendment; and I will say further, that I came here this morning with the intention of withdrawing the proposition to recommit these various propositions to the committee, for it seemed to me that we were reaching a point when we could agree here, in the face of the country, on what particular proposition we would vote. I think I said so to the Senator from Ohio himself.

Mr. WADE. Not at all. You did not say a word to me about it.

Mr. WILSON. However, be that as it may, I desire the Secretary to read the proposition that I propose to offer as an amendment to the resolution of my colleague; and I intend, with the leave of the Senate, the yeas and nays having been ordered while I was for a moment absent, to withdraw the motion to recommit these various propositions; and I do so in the conviction that we are reaching a point where we can vote upon that subject.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to have my amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be read, if there be no objection. Is there any objection?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object to the withdrawal of the motion to recommit unless the Senator has a right to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not the question now before the Senate. The question is on reading the proposed amendment. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Whereas it has come to the knowledge of Congress that great numbers of our soldiers who have fallen as prisoners of war into the hands of the insurgents have been subjected to treatment unexampled for cruelty in the history of civilized war, which has resulted in the death of multitudes by the slow process of starvation, and by mortal diseases occasioned by insufficient and unhealthy food, and by wanton exposure of their persons to the inclemency of the weather: Therefore,

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and required to cause such full and ample retaliation to be made, according to the laws and usages of war among civilized nations, as shall be effective in deterring the rebel authorities from the perpetration in future of cruel and barbarous treatment of our soldiers.

And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and required, as soon as may be after the passage of this resolution, to appoint two commissaries of prisoners with the rebel authorities, with the view of devising some practicable plan for the relief and better treatment of our prisoners of war.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to withdraw his motion to refer the resolution before the Senate with all the amendments that have been proposed to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the motion cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is necessary that we should have a short executive session, and, as it is now a late hour, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I will state to my colleague that I shall have no objection at all, if a majority of the Senate shall desire it, to resume the consideration of legislative business after the executive session, but it is necessary to have a short executive session now.

Mr. WADE. We shall not be able to resume this subject if we go into executive session now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think this matter can be closed to-night, and I must insist on my motion.

Mr. WADE. If there is anything absolutely necessary to be done I will not resist it.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The motion of Mr. SHERMAN was agreed to; and, after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 30, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. V. M. HULBERT, of Youkers, New York.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business during the morning hour to-day is the consideration and reference of bills and joint resolutions on leave to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back by motions to reconsider.

The committees were then called for that purpose.

COLUMBIA INSTITUTION FOR THE DEAF, ETC.

Mr. PATTERSON introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the deaf, the dumb, and the blind, approved February 16, 1857," which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, introduced a joint resolution relative to revolutionary pensions; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS AND OTHERS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, introduced a joint resolution relative to the compensation of members of Congress and the officers of the Government employed in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is that resolution entitled to be referred, under the rule, anyhow?

The SPEAKER. The rule is positive that all bills and joint resolutions are to be referred without debate, not to be brought back by motion to reconsider.

The resolution was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

HARBOR OF MICHIGAN CITY.

Mr. WILSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore,

The SPEAKER introduced a bill to constitute the harbor of Michigan City, Indiana, a port of entry, and to release the claim of the General Government to the tonnage duties of said harbor to the Michigan City Harbor Company to aid in its improvement; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF FOR FORFEITED PROPERTY.

Mr. POSTON introduced a bill for the adjustment of private land claims in the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. SWEAT introduced a bill to authorize the extension of the Northern Pacific railroad eastward to Ontonagon, State of Michigan, and provide for its connection eastward with the Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Canadian systems of railroads at Port Huron, Detroit, Toledo, Fort Wayne, and Dayton; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the select committee on the Pacific railroad.

The call of States and Territories for resolutions having been completed, the Speaker proceeded to call the States and Territories for resolutions, commencing with the State of Illinois, where the call was last suspended.

HARBOR AT ONTONAGON RIVER.

Mr. BEAMAN presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan asking the United States Government for a grant of lands in aid of the construction of a harbor at the mouth of the Ontonagon river, on the southern shore of Lake Superior; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SHIP CANAL.

Mr. BEAMAN also presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, asking the Government of the United States for a grant of lands in aid of the construction of a ship canal from Portage Lake to Lake Superior; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. WILSON offered the following resolution; upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what legislation is necessary to prevent payments for the transportation of property, troops, &c., of the United States by railway companies which have agreed, in consideration of land grants to them by the United States, to supply such transportation free of toll or other charge, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HOLMAN. That resolution is manifestly very proper, but I want to suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that this subject has heretofore been before the Committee of Claims. A communication from the Secretary of War upon this very subject was referred to that Committee on Friday last, and I submit that this resolution had better go to that committee.

Mr. WILSON. It involves the construction of the several acts making land grants to railroad corporations. That subject was before the Committee on the Judiciary during the Thirty-Seventh Congress, and was reported on by Mr. Porter, of Indiana, a member of the Judiciary Committee at that time. I therefore desire to have the subject referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. The same subject is now pending before the Committee of Claims, but I presume the reference to the Judiciary Committee would be correct, and I will not object.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUREAU OF AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means are hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing in the Treasury Department a bureau to be called the Bureau of Statistics, for the collection and publication annually of the statistics of external and internal commerce, also agricultural, mineral, and manufactured productions; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TREATMENT OF FREEDMEN.

Mr. GRINNELL submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war be directed to inquire into the treatment of the men, women, and children of African descent, made free by the President's proclamation, by the fourteenth Army corps, commanded by Major General Jefferson C. Davis, of General Sherman's army, in its recent march from Atlanta to Savannah, and report thereon at their earliest convenience.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to inquire what is the object of this resolution? General Jeff. C. Davis, of Indiana, is a very gallant and patriotic soldier, and this resolution seems to imply a censure upon his conduct in some way. I trust it will be explained.

Mr. GRINNELL. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana—

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Then I object to debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was put; and the House refused to lay the resolution on the table—ayes 38, noes 65.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to suggest to the gentleman—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. J. C. ALLEN] objects to debate, and it is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GRINNELL. I will be glad to answer any question or suggestion, if I can have an opportunity.

Several MEMBERS. I object.

Mr. MALLORY. I simply wish to say to the gentleman that if he will modify his resolution so as to say "General Sherman and his army," instead of "Jeff. Davis and his army," I will vote for it.

The SPEAKER. Debate is objected to. The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The question being taken, there were, on a division—ayes 63, noes 19; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. GRINNELL and HOLMAN.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 21.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GRINNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF CONSCRIPTION ACT.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I offer the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act to regulate and provide for enrolling and calling out the national forces as to give enrolling officers the power to administer oaths to all who they may believe fail or refuse to tell the truth as to their ages, &c.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INCREASED PAY OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. COBB. I offer the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That in view of the enormous expenses of the Government rendered necessary for the maintenance of the Army and Navy employed for the defense of the Government against the existing rebellion, and the onerous taxes imposed upon the people for the purpose of meeting such expenses, it is the sense of this House that no law ought to be enacted whereby the salary or compensation of any class of employees of the Government shall be raised or increased.

Mr. IOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman that he should modify his resolution by inserting after the words "employees of the Government" the words "except the soldiers."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I thought that all these resolutions went to some appropriate committee.

The SPEAKER. That part of the morning business embracing bills on leave and joint resolutions has been gone through with. This is the call of States for resolutions, under which the gentleman has the right to demand the previous question in the same manner as was done last Monday on the paper-duty bill.

Mr. STEVENS. Unless the gentleman will consent to have the resolution referred to some committee, I move that it be laid on the table.

Mr. COBB. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays; and call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion of Mr. STEVENS was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAXATION OF STEAM AND SAIL VESSELS.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I offer the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means are hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws taxing earnings of steam and sail vessels as to levy a tax on the net instead of gross earnings.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

POLITICAL PRISONERS.

Mr. ELDRIDGE submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested, and the Secretary of State and Secretary of War be directed, to report and furnish to this House the names of the persons, if any there are, who have been arrested and are now held in imprisonment or confinement in any prison, fort, or other place whatsoever, for political offenses or any other alleged offense against the command or authority of the United States by the order, command, consent, or knowledge of any of them, or either of them respectively, and who have not been charged, tried, or convicted before any civil or criminal (not military) court of the land, together with the charge against such person, or cause for such arrest and imprisonment, excepting only such persons as may at the time of their arrest have been in the military or naval service of the United States, together with the name of the person, fort, or place where they are severally kept or confined; also whether any person or persons, for any alleged like offense, have been banished or sent from the United States, or those not in rebellion to the rebellious States, the names, times, alleged offenses, and causes thereof; and whether with or without trial; and if tried, before what court.

The SPEAKER. This being a call on the executive departments for information, must, if objected to, lie over one day.

Mr. SLOAN. I object.

INCREASE OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. SLOAN submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and hereby are, instructed to report a bill amending the act to provide internal revenue, &c., so that the revenue produced by said act shall be increased at least thirty-three and a third per cent.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The resolution is an absolute instruction of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to modify his resolution so that it will direct the committee to inquire into the expediency of increasing the internal revenue, &c.

Mr. SLOAN. I decline to modify the resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 19.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by his Private Secretary, Mr. NICOLAY, notifying the House that he had approved and signed on 28th January, instant, bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 659) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1866; and

An act (H. R. No. 677) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes, approved June 30, 1864."

TOBACCO AND MEDICINES FOR SOLDIERS.

Mr. McINDOE submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas many of our soldiers in the field are so situated that they can obtain many of the necessities of life only by mail from their friends at home, and as many complaints are made in regard to the exorbitant rates of postage they are compelled to pay upon many articles, imposing upon them a burden to which their limited pay is unfit: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be directed to inquire into the expediency of so amending existing postage laws that soldiers in the field may be enabled to receive the following enumerated articles at the rate at which they receive packages of clothing, to wit: tobacco and medicines.

DISTRICT OF OREGON.

Mr. McBRIDE submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act organizing the district of customs known as the District of Oregon as to include the city of Portland within the limits of said district, and to report by bill or otherwise.

BRANCH MINT AT DALLES, OREGON.

Mr. COLE, of Washington Territory, presented the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, in relation to the branch mint at Dalles, Oregon; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. COLE, of Washington Territory, also presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, praying Congress to remove the custom-house from Port Angeles to Port Townsend; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CONTRABAND MANUFACTURE OF LIQUORS.

Mr. INGERSOLL submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be hereby instructed to inquire whether any further legislation is necessary to prevent the contraband manufacture of domestic liquors; and further to inquire into the practicability of establishing a uniform system or mode of gauging and inspecting domestic liquors throughout the United States, which shall be the basis of all sales, except by special agreement to the contrary.

THANKS FOR GENERAL BUTLER'S REMOVAL.

Mr. ROSS submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the thanks of Congress and of the country are due, and are hereby tendered, to his Excellency Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, for relieving from service Major General Benjamin F. Butler.

Mr. GRINNELL moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is discussion in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to discuss the resolution, and I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

The question was put, and it was decided in the negative—ayes 37, noes 70.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then the resolution goes over under the rule.

Mr. MALLORY. Did not the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] move to lay the resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear it, and did not entertain the motion.

Mr. GRINNELL. I made the motion.

Mr. MALLORY. I heard the gentleman make the motion.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will consider the motion as pending.

Mr. MALLORY. On the motion to lay the resolution on the table I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand the Chair did not hear the motion, and did not entertain it. I demanded the previous question, and that motion was put.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken. His colleague demanded the previous question, but the gentleman from Illinois hoped it would not be seconded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Did the gentleman from Iowa rise in his seat and make the motion?

Mr. GRINNELL. I did.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the motion, as he has uniformly done, on the assertion of the gentleman from Iowa that he submitted it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is not the gentleman at liberty to withdraw it?

The SPEAKER. He is; but the gentleman persists in the motion.

The question was put, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 43, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Benham, Blaine, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. The latter motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War transmitting a statement from the Adjutant General as to the publication of the Army Register; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

RECRUITS TO FILL UP OLD REGIMENTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War in reply to a resolution of the House respecting recruits enlisted to fill up old regiments.

The communication was read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT.
WASHINGTON CITY, January 28, 1865.

SIR: In answer to the resolution of the House, dated December 15, 1864, making inquiries concerning certain alleged letters and orders respecting recruits enlisted to fill an old regiment, I have the honor to submit the annexed report of the Adjutant General.

To the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th of January, relating to the same subject, and inquiring why the information called for by the previous resolution had not been furnished, I have the honor to state that the delay in answering was occasioned by the pressure of business upon this Department, and the necessity of examining orders, correspondence, and muster-rolls embracing a period of more than two years, and relating to the enlistment of many thousand soldiers.

The exigencies of the service in the field, and absence occasioned by sickness, or on public business, have much reduced the experienced force in this Department. This, and the transaction of daily business during the sessions of Congress, unavoidably protract answers to calls by committee and Congress for information that requires examination of the voluminous correspondence and rolls of the Department.

Your obedient servant, EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.
Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., January 28, 1865.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt on the 15th ultimo of your reference of the following resolution of the House of Representatives:

December 15, 1864.

On motion of Mr. HOLMAN,
Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish to the House copies of the order issued from his Department on the 21st day of December, 1863, in regard to recruits enlisted with conditions that they should be discharged when their regiments were mustered out of service; also, copy of order or letter, dated the 22d day of December, 1863, and addressed to the Governor of the State of Massachusetts, in regard to recruits to fill up old regiments, and that he inform the House whether the principles announced in the order above mentioned have been applied to all soldiers mustered into the service to fill up the old regiments.

Attest: EDWARD McPHERSON,
Clerk.

In reply, I respectfully report as follows:

1. No order of December 21, 1863, such as appears contemplated by the aforesaid resolution, was issued by this Department.

2. No "order or letter" of December 22, 1863, was "addressed to the Governor of the State of Massachusetts in regard to recruits to fill up old regiments."

A copy of a telegram of July 21, 1863, believed to be the one contemplated by the resolution, and referring to that subject, is submitted herewith.

In accordance with the intent of that telegram, the recruits enlisted under its special authority in the year 1863, were mustered out with their regiments, but it was held inapplicable to subsequent enlistments in 1863. By a letter to Governor Andrew, on the 28th of December, 1863, which may be the same alluded to in the resolution, a copy whereof is annexed, he was informed of the view taken by the Department, and that while those enlisted specially for the unexpired term under the telegram of July 21 would be mustered out in accordance with it, that rule was not then in force.

3. The principles announced in the telegram of July 21, 1863, have not been "applied to all soldiers mustered into the service to fill up the old regiments." The principle applied to soldiers mustered into the service to fill up old regiments, has been to hold them for the term of service for which they were mustered in, taking the muster-roll as conclusive evidence of the enlistment contract with the Government, where it was not modified by express authority of the War Department.

It is believed, also, that in all but these excepted cases, where bounties were paid, the bounty received by the soldier corresponds with the muster-roll.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

WASHINGTON, July 21, 1863, 4.15 p. m.

Governor ANDREW, Boston:

You are authorized to say that new recruits for old regiments will be mustered with the regiment.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

The foregoing telegram is given as it was written and transmitted, but Governor Andrew claimed, and no doubt correctly, that the word "out" was designed to follow the word "mustered," but had been inadvertently omitted, and that he had so understood and acted upon it. This view had been assented to by the Department, so that it should read as follows:

WASHINGTON, July 21, 1863, 4.15 p. m.

Governor ANDREW, Boston:

You are authorized to say that new recruits for old regiments will be mustered out with the regiment.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., December 28, 1863.

SIR: The Secretary of War directs me to inform you that all men enlisted in volunteer organizations from Massachusetts for the unexpired term of service of regiments, pursuant to his telegram of July 21, 1863, will be mustered out of service and discharged with the regiments to which they belong. It is of course unnecessary to add that this rule is not now in force.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
SAMUEL BRECK,
Assistant Adjutant General.

His Excellency JOHN A. ANDREWS,
Governor of Massachusetts, Boston.

The papers were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in the same connection, desires to lay before the House a memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana upon the same question, which was sent directly to the Chair to be laid before the House.

The memorial was received, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the memorial may be printed in the Globe.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and
House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The General Assembly of the State of Indiana respectfully beg leave to memorialize your honorable body upon matters herein set forth, and which your memorialists deem of great importance to many citizens of the State, and to which your immediate attention is earnestly requested.

Prior to the 1st of January, 1863, the ranks of the old regiments then in the field had become so greatly decimated by hard service and frequent engagements with the enemy that it became necessary, in order to preserve such organizations, and a general anxiety was felt, both by the people and the authorities, that they should be speedily filled up with recruits.

This anxiety greatly stimulated enlistments, and the prospect of serving in companies with experienced comrades encouraged volunteering.

The men thus recruited in the State of Indiana had the full understanding that they were enlisted for the unexpired time of the old organizations into which they were mustered, and that they would be mustered out of the service at the expiration of the original term of service of such old organizations.

In this understanding the volunteer, the recruiting officer, the State authorities, and the people, fully participated, and in the absence of any order from the War Department affecting the subject, and for reasons following, this view of the matter was not unreasonable.

1. At the time these enlistments were made the impression prevailed generally in the Army, and among the people, that the war would end and the soldiers be discharged even before the expiration of the original term of service of the organizations into which such recruits were mustered.

2. The recruiting was carried on for particular regiments, and not for the service generally, there being no general system of recruiting for the Army established, thus naturally producing a belief that no service outside of or beyond the term of these regiments would be exacted.

3. The advantages of maintaining old organizations, and placing recruits among old, experienced associates, under the command of tried officers, was apparent to all, and it was equally apparent that no recruits could be induced to enlist in any organization that would terminate prior to the expiration of the term for which said recruits were to be mustered, thereby separating such recruits from their former comrades and officers, and without their consent attaching them to organizations in which they would be total strangers.

4. Whole regiments had been enlisted and accepted into the service for terms no greater, thus inducing the belief that soldiers were desired without particular reference to the term of service.

5. The impending draft of that year was for a term of nine months, which induced the belief that volunteering for a much longer period, as was the case with such recruits, would be a judicious arrangement for the Government.

6. At the time these enlistments were made no system of recruiting had been devised or talked of, and of course there could be no intimation that any regiment would be continued beyond the time of its original enlistment.

With these views recruiting officers invariably informed such recruits that they were to be discharged at the expiration of the term of service of the old organizations into which they consented to be mustered, and this was agreed to and concurred in by the mustering officers then on duty. Recruiting and mustering officers were strengthened in this view of the case from the general tenor of certain orders of the War Department, providing for and regulating recruiting for old regiments, which orders when critically considered were not as explicit as might have been desired, but nevertheless were apparently on the hypothesis that the recruiting was for the old regiments, and not for the general service, and that they would be discharged at the expiration of the term of such old regiments. One of the orders reads as follows:

[General Orders, No. 108.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, — 28, 1863.

1. Whenever volunteer troops are mustered out of service, the entire regiment or other organization will be considered as mustered out at one time and place, except prisoners of war, who will be considered as in service until their arrival in a loyal State, with an allowance of time necessary for them to return to their respective places of enrollment.

By order of the Secretary of War:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Nor was this understanding, as your memorialists are advised, confined to the people of the State of Indiana, but that it prevailed extensively in other States. And this general prevalence of such views tended to strengthen the same with the people of Indiana. The following official document was extensively published in the public journals, and greatly tended to increase the probability of the correctness of the views generally entertained by the people.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, September 28, 1862.

SIR: In reply to yours of the 21st instant stating the number of regiments raised and to be raised in your State, and also making suggestions in reference to filling old regiments, I am directed to say that recruits for old regiments of volunteers for three years or during the war will be discharged at the expiration of the term for which the regiment was originally enlisted.

By order of the Secretary of War:

C. P. BUCKINGHAM,

Brigadier General and A. A. General.

His Excellency Governor KIRKLAND, of Iowa.

The foregoing facts your memorialists believe to be sufficient to establish the fact that recruits enlisted in old organizations at the time referred to were fully under the impression that they were only to serve for the unexpired time of the organization into which they were mustered, and that their retention in the service after such time would be a great hardship upon them, and is greatly calculated to discourage and dishearten them. Your memorialists are fully aware that the muster rolls which said recruits signed described an enlistment for three years or during the war, but at the same time are informed, and believe, that such averments in said rolls were explained to them as being mere technical forms, and would in no wise interfere with the understanding upon which they were enlisted, and thus did not disturb the conviction in their minds that they would be discharged with the regiments they were assigned to; but on the contrary that the Government would, in good faith to her soldiers, execute fully the agreement made with them by the recruiting officers.

Your memorialists are further informed that this matter has by his Excellency Governor Morton been fully laid before the War Department, and its action urged in reference to the same, and that said Department has decided that it can take no action in the matter, as from the form of the muster rolls these recruits would be held for a term of three years, without reference to the expiration of the term of the organizations to which they belong. But at the same time your memorialists are confidently of the opinion that it is clearly within the power of Congress to grant the proper remedy to these worthymen, and your attention is respectfully but earnestly called to the matter, as alike demanded by justice, good faith, and sound policy.

One case your memorialists desire to call your especial attention to, as somewhat differing from all others.

The company of Captain Charles W. Patton, in the forty-fifth regiment (or third cavalry) of Indiana volunteers, were enlisted entire under the full understanding above set forth, and in all respects are entitled to the benefits in the foregoing memorial mentioned, as they were recruits mustered into an old organization. But their case presents another merit not enjoyed by any others. So confident were all parties that the recruits were simply to serve for the unexpired term of the old organizations, that the muster rolls of this company show that fact. By reference to such rolls on file in the office of the adjutant general, your memorialists find that the certificate of the mustering officer attached to the muster-in-rolls of said company reads as follows:

I certify on honor that I have carefully examined the men whose names are borne on this roll, their horses and equipments, and have accepted them into the service of the United States for the unexpired term of three years, for the forty-fifth Indiana cavalry, unless sooner discharged, from this 11th day of December, 1862.

JOHN B. MILLER,
Captain Thirtieth United States Infantry,
Mustering Officer.

Date, December 11, 1862.

Station, Indianapolis, Indiana.

The forty-fifth regiment, into which this company was thus mustered, has served the full term of three years, and has been mustered out of the service of the United States, except such recruits to the same as above mentioned, which said recruits (composing the company of the said Captain Patton) are still held and retained in service, notwithstanding the express understanding above referred to, and the official certificate of the mustering officer, as above recited. Wherefore your memorialists respectfully submit the foregoing memorial, and confidently expect that your honorable body may speedily adopt such measures as the merits of the case, and justice to the patriotic defenders of our common country, require.

JOHN U. PETTIT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

CONRAD BAKER,

President of the Senate,

CYRUS T. NIXON,

Principal Clerk of House,

A. T. WHITTELEY,

Principal Secretary Senate.

Attest: REBEL RAID ON LAKE ERIE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House calling for the report of General Dix in relation to the rebel raid on Lake Erie; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent laid before the House a report from the Clerk of the House of the annual contingent expenses of the House; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

Leave was granted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It will be recollected by the House that a week ago to-day my colleague [Mr. WASHBURN] introduced a joint resolution reducing the duty upon imported paper from twenty per cent., the present duty, to three per cent. Upon it he called the previous question, and it was passed by the House without debate.

I now send to the Clerk's desk an article in the Chicago Tribune, a letter which I understand was written by an employé of this House. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Mr. WASHBURN's motion to-day, springing the question of repealing the paper duty, took the House by surprise. KASSON, BLOW, PENDELTON, and MALLORY had been at work in the Ways and Means Committee trying to secure a report in favor of a repeal, or at least the reduction of duty, but WASHBURN determined to cut the knot off delay by bringing in an independent resolution and bringing the members squarely up to the question. The paper monopolists died very hard, and after they saw that the House was two to one against them, they still persisted in filibustering, under the lead of Judge SPALDING of Ohio, FARNSWORTH of Illinois, and BROOMALL of Pennsylvania, who, together with RICE of Massachusetts, were the conspicuous advocates of this tax on knowledge and defenders of the paper monopoly. Several members voted against the repeal on the principle of opposing any important legislation forced through under the previous question. The vote does not, therefore, show the full strength of the House in favor of the repeal. Paper makers are here in force, and are exceedingly active in lobbying. They will now concentrate their full force in the Senate, where friends of the repeal will also need to bestow special attention. The following are the yeas and nays on the final vote on the passage of the repeal in the House."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I presume that it has not passed out of the recollection of members of the House what the proceedings were upon that occasion. It is true that a large minority of this House opposed the passage of that resolution, expressing at the time their dissent to that sort of legislation, under the gag rule, which settles an important question of tariff without discussion and without investigation.

But I rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to this article, and of making an explanation of the position which I occupy with reference to that resolution. I am not in the habit of noticing newspaper articles. I am not either in the habit of looking upon newspapers with contempt. I have great respect for newspapers and for newspaper men. This is the first time that I have ever occupied the attention of the House in noticing any article from a newspaper; but it seemed to me that this attack upon a large minority of the House, and that, too, by an employé of the House—for I understand this article was written by the librarian of the House—is so gross and false and scandalous that it ought not to pass unnoticed and unrebuked.

When my colleague [Mr. WASHBURN] introduced that resolution, I stated to the House that I hoped it would not pass without discussion, and when the previous question was pressed, I moved to lay the resolution on the table, and then when that motion failed I voted against the passage of the joint resolution. That was the extent of my action upon that occasion.

This scribbler, however, apologizes for a portion of the members who voted with the minority upon that occasion. He does not wish his editor to understand that every member who voted with SPALDING and FARNSWORTH and BROOMALL and RICE of Massachusetts, was equally culpable with them, for some of them voted against the resolution upon the ground that they did not like to settle an important question of legislation under the previous question. But he charges upon us four, and upon some other members who are not named, that we are paper monopolists, and that we are the creatures of lobbyists for this "tax upon knowledge," as he represents it.

Now, let me say that I have not seen in this House, nor in the city of Washington during the present session of Congress, nor have I heard of there being here, a paper manufacturer or a lobbyist for a paper manufacturer. And yet who does not know that we have been constantly lobbied by newspaper men who are in favor of this reduction of the tariff?

Mr. CRAVENS. I rise to a question of order. I hardly think this is a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. It is not; but the House has granted unanimous consent to the gentleman from Illinois to make a personal explanation.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. This is certainly not a personal explanation. The gentleman is discussing a resolution which passed the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that up to this point the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois have been in the nature of a personal explanation.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. It may be personal to other members, but not to himself.

The SPEAKER. When the House gives unanimous consent to a gentleman to make a personal explanation, it opens a very wide range of debate.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the very writer of this article himself, it seems, is a lobbyist for the newspaper men on this question; and not only does he lobby members of the House here, but he writes letters to newspapers that are to come back to members for their perusal, to influence their mind and action in this House. It is said that this is "a tax upon knowledge!" If we repeal the duty on paper, had we not better repeal the taxes that are now levied on articles that are of prime necessity to the poor man, and with which he cannot dispense? Had we not better repeal the tax upon shoe-leather, on tea, coffee, sugar, and all other articles that the poor man cannot dispense with, that are articles of prime necessity, as much so, certainly, as knowledge?

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if my colleague [Mr. WASHBURN] had taxed his knowledge a little more he never would have introduced his resolution. A tax upon knowledge! These are the cant phrases, the clap-trap expressions, used by men who seek to repeal this duty; yet we tax those things which are necessary to sustain life itself. The shoemakers might with as much propriety cry out against the duties upon leather as a tax upon understanding! The House will recollect that while the newspapers can speak weekly and daily to the members of this House and to the country, the paper manufacturers, the men representing that growing interest of the country, cannot speak through any such agency. A tax upon knowledge! You cannot take up a circular or a petition or a newspaper article on the subject in which you do not find this phrase constantly repeated. But I would ask any member of the House whether he has received petitions from his constituents, from those who pay this "tax upon knowledge" to vote for a repeal of the duty on paper? I have a large constituency, a reading constituency. There are many newspapers published in my district besides the city newspapers that circulate there. I have not received a letter or petition from any of them asking me to vote for a reduction or repeal of the tariff on imported paper. And yet they are the men who are taxed, as it is said; they are the men who take newspapers and read them and pay for them. If this be a tax on knowledge, it is a tax that is brought to their doors and not to the doors of the newspapers.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. The gentleman from Illinois has inquired whether any member has received a petition from his constituents in favor of the repeal of this duty. It may be pertinent for me to say here that two of the local newspapers in my district have taken ground against the repeal of this duty on paper.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then they are very sound papers, and soundly edited. And I am satisfied that, on the examination of this question, every reasonable editor throughout the country will find that he is standing very much in his own light, and acting against his own interest as well as against the interest of his country, in striking this blow at the large paper-manufacturing interest of the country.

When this subject was first broached to me some time ago, as it was by newspaper men in the State of Illinois, I was inclined, without much reflection, to coincide in their sentiments. I was inclined to the opinion that the duty should be repealed. So much was said to me that I commenced an investigation of the subject, and the more I examined it, the more I investigated it, and the more I thought of it, the more I became convinced that the true policy, not only for the country, but for the newspapers also, was to let the duty on paper remain as it is, thus fostering and protecting, if need be, the manufacture of paper, as we now do all other manufactures, and allow it to regulate itself by proper competition. The manufacture of paper is steadily increasing in the West. Paper can be manufactured there cheaper than perhaps anywhere else in the United States.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order. I do not think that every member of this House has a right, under the guise of a question of privilege, to consume an hour in answering every newspaper paragraph that may come under his notice. This subject is not a question before the House, but has been already passed upon.

The SPEAKER. The House has decided that the gentleman from Illinois should have unanimous consent to speak for one hour in personal explanation. That is the decision of the House, and not of the Chair.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I know that it has been said, and is said by the advocates of the repeal of this duty upon paper, or rather by the advocates of the reduction of the duty to three per cent., that the Government being a consumer of paper to some extent, is now a loser by imposing the present tariff of twenty per cent., which amounts to prohibition, and that, by reducing that tariff to three per cent., which is the amount of the excise tax upon manufactured paper, the Government could derive the same amount of revenue that it now receives from the manufacture of paper. I want to say a word or two on that subject.

Now, sir, if the three per cent. excise tax were all that the Government derived from the manufacture of paper, still the reduction of the duty upon the foreign article to three per cent. would not bring into the Treasury as much as does the three per cent. excise tax, because the three per cent. excise tax—

Mr. MALLORY. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is that the gentleman from Illinois is not making a personal explanation, but is arguing deliberately and in extenso a measure of public policy. The time will arise when the gentleman can say all that he wishes to say.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am explaining the reason for my action, which has been criticised in this paper.

Mr. MALLORY. Anything which involves an attack on a member individually, which goes to impugn his motives, may authorize him, perhaps, under the privilege of making a personal explanation, to make statements to show that these charges are false; but I deny that, under permission to make a personal explanation, a member can legitimately go into an argument of a question of tariff, revenue, or any other such subject as is being discussed by the gentleman. I submit that such a course is an abuse of the privilege extended to him by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in deciding this point of order, would state that, if the gentleman from Illinois had submitted this matter as a question of privilege, the Chair would have ruled that this debate was not in order, as the gentleman, in proceeding in this line of remarks, would be debating a proposition which the House had determined, by sustaining the previous question, should not be debated. It has always been held that, when the House grants unanimous consent to a gentleman to make a personal explanation, the largest latitude of debate is given. The Chair, therefore, cannot attempt to control the line of the gentleman's remarks so long as he confines himself to the point upon which he has been criticised, and in regard to which he has asked consent to make a personal explanation. The House having, by unanimous consent, granted him that privilege, the Chair cannot arrest the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not intend to occupy much time, nor to abuse the courtesy extended to me by the House. But I deem it proper to explain the grounds of my action in reference to this question, as it has been criticised by this newspaper.

I was about to say that the three per cent. excise tax now paid upon the manufacture of paper is paid upon the value of the paper manufactured here, while the tariff which it is proposed to reduce to three per cent. is paid upon the value of the imported article in the foreign country. Now, paper abroad is worth eight cents per pound. Your three per cent. tariff would be collected upon that. Paper manufactured here is worth at the present time about twenty-two cents per pound. The excise tax is three per cent. upon that, making a very great difference, as the House will see.

But that is not all that we lose. We lose the entire tariff and excise taxes which are imposed upon all the articles which enter into the manufacture of paper. If we repeal this duty upon paper, or reduce it to three per cent., which amounts to about the same thing, leaving the tariff upon those materials which enter largely into the manufacture of paper in this country, we close up the paper-mills of our own country, and offer a premium to the paper manufacturers of foreign countries to supply our own market with their paper. Nothing, it seems to me, is more clear.

Why, sir, shall we say to foreign countries that the very paper upon which we print our laws cannot be manufactured in our own country, but shall be imported from abroad? It is true that the Government pays a larger amount for paper which it consumes than it would if paper cost less. There is that difference. How much it amounts to, I am unable to say; it is not a very great sum, however.

I have made a calculation of the difference to the revenue between the law as it now stands, with excise duties and tariff upon materials, and as it will be in case the resolution of my colleague [Mr. WASHBURN] shall become the law. I find, and in this I have been aided by some tables which, on examination, I find to be remarkably accurate, that the tariff and excise duties upon the materials used in the manufacture of one ton of paper, in currency, amount to $22 63. Now you add the excise tax of three per cent. upon the paper, calling paper twenty-two cents per pound, would make $13 50 more per ton, making $36 13 which the Government derives from the manufacture of paper in our own country, upon every ton of it.

Now for the foreign article. A duty of three per cent. upon the article, calling paper worth eight cents per pound, which I believe is the present price of it in Belgium, and converting that three per cent. into currency, calling gold 225, and the Government derives from a ton of paper so imported only $10 80, making a difference in favor of the present law of $25 33 on a ton of paper. There are seven or eight hundred paper mills in the country manufacturing upon an average a ton of paper a day each. There is a difference of $25 33 upon every ton of paper. You have, then, in round numbers, a difference annually of $7,000,000 to the revenue of the Government, as between the law as it now stands and the proposed change of my colleague. This is a matter, Mr. Speaker, which it seems to me ought to be taken into consideration.

It will be observed that in this estimate I have not added into the account the income tax, war tax, nor excise tax upon freights, iron for repairs, machinery, or coal when used as a power. Then consider that there are fifty thousand men employed in working these mills in the United States who will be discharged from employment if the mills stop.

There is another fact which may be considered in connection with what I said before. The newspapers of the country have increased their price. They are charging more for their papers and more for advertising than they did before. They have brought up their price in proportion to the enhanced price of everything else. Must not the manufacturer of paper do the same thing? Why, sir, look at the difference in the State of Illinois between the prices before the war and now. In my own town, before the war, labor could be obtained at seventy-five cents per day by the year, and it now costs $1 50 by the year. Coal could be purchased in Chicago at $5 50 per ton, and it now costs twelve to fifteen dollars. Lime cost fifty-five cents per barrel, now it costs $1 25. Lard oil seventy-five cents per gallon, now it costs two dollars. Chloride of lime then cost three and a half cents per pound, now it costs seven. Soda-ash cost two and a half cents, now it costs six. Boarding laborers then cost twelve to fourteen shillings per week, now it costs five dollars per week. Upon examination it will be found that everything else used in the manufacture of paper has gone up in like or greater proportion. Machinery, iron used in repairs, rags and straw, wood and coal, felting, wire, band leather, &c. So it is with the cost of transportation. Indeed, every article used in the manufacture of paper has at least doubled in value, and some have much more than doubled. Notwithstanding this, and notwithstanding the income taxes, excise taxes, war taxes, &c., paper can be bought to-day for a little more than double what it could then. It is now I think twenty-two cents, and then it was I think about ten and a half cents.

Another thing I wish to call the attention of the House to is the difference in the profit derived from the manufacture of paper and the profit derived from these city newspapers. I find, sir, that the proprietors of that very newspaper, the Chicago Tribune, are paying an income tax upon $120,000 a year.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. When was this?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. For the year 1863.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Before this tax was put on?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Why, sir, the tariff was higher in 1863 than now. Does not my colleague know that fact?

Mr. STEVENS. It was thirty-five per cent., and we reduced it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I speak of the tax imposed upon the public by the combination of the paper makers. This profit was made before this combination existed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman says that was before the combination of the paper makers. I know of no such combination; but I do know, as well as I can know anything of which I am not personally cognizant, that there was no combination among the paper makers of the West.

I was contrasting the incomes derived from the manufacture of paper, and those from the publication of newspapers. I find that the proprietors of the Chicago Tribune, for the year 1863, gave in the following incomes over and above the $600 exempt to each of the proprietors: William Bross, $25,957; Alfred Cowles, $27,073; Joseph Medill, $26,790; Charles H. Ray, $12,529; J. S. Scripps, $23,856; and the editor of the Chicago Journal's income was $25,554.

There you see the profits for one year derived from the publication of a newspaper in the city of Chicago, which has taken the lead in this crusade against the paper manufacturers of the West.

Mr. Speaker, we have many paper mills in the West, but not so many as I wish, and as I expect to see, if we cease tampering with tariffs, and stop this futile legislation. It is a growing interest there, and with the facilities and materials which we possess, water power, straw, flax, and rags in abundance, I expect to see a paper mill every three miles along the Rock and Fox rivers in my State. I know of no good reason why they should be singled out from all other manufacturers and compelled to close their mills for the benefit of the foreigner, and to gratify the mistaken policy of a few already wealthy newspaper proprietors. For my part, I am glad to see newspapers thrive, and their proprietors prosperous and happy. I do not find fault with that.

Here is a table showing the tariffs at different periods upon printing paper, and upon materials used in its manufacture:

	1846.	1857.	1861.	1862.	1863.
	Perc.	Perc.	Perc.	Perc.	Perc.
Paper.....	30	24	30	35	20
Soda ash.....	10	4	50 cts. per 100 lbs.
Bleaching powder.....	10	4	30
Alum.....	20	15	60
Oil vitriol.....	20	4	1 ct. per lb.
Woolen feltings.....	30	24	20 cts. per lb. and 35 per ct. ad val.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me to make a remark or two?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to answer my colleague, and I hope he will give way to a motion to postpone the subject. The gentleman has had an opportunity to argue his side of the subject, and I wish to argue my side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that permission to make a personal explanation is not a transferable right, as is a transfer of the floor under the hour rule for general debate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I shall object to his yielding the floor, unless I can have an opportunity to reply to my colleague.

Mr. MALLORY. I object to this debate going on in this informal manner. I object to any further personal explanations this morning.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] is involved in this gross attack, I hope the House will extend to him the same courtesy that has been extended to me.

I have said all I desired to say at the present time, and I give way to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object, unless I can have an hour.

Mr. SPALDING. I have no argument to make, but simply a statement.

The SPEAKER. How long a time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. SPALDING. Five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I shall object also, unless I can have the privilege of answering my colleague.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, no further debate is in order.

VOTES FOR PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. STEVENS. There is on the Speaker's table a message from the Senate requesting the House to appoint a committee to meet a committee of the Senate to make arrangements for counting the electoral vote. I think we should respond to it, and I ask that it may be taken up.

No objection being made, the resolution of the Senate was taken from the table and reported, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of three members be appointed by the President of the Senate, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and of notifying the persons chosen of their election.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House accede to the request of the Senate, and that a committee of five be appointed upon the part of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently appointed as such committee Messrs. STEVENS, WASHBURN of Illinois, MALLORY, DAVIS of Maryland, and Cox.

COMMITTEE ON VENTILATION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there has been a resolution from the Senate on the Speaker's table since the 12th of January, which has never been called up. The Chair will submit it to the House, and then ask if there be any objection to its consideration.

The resolution of the Senate was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) 1. That the joint committee on ventilation and improvement of the Halls of Congress be authorized to examine witnesses and employ a reporter.

2. That the members of the Committees of the two Houses upon Public Buildings and Grounds be added to the said joint committee upon ventilation, &c., for the purpose of deciding upon any plan or proposition of improvement which may be before said committee for consideration.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have objected to that once before, and I object to taking it up now.

Mr. PIKE. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering it.

The House refused to suspend the rules, and the resolution was not considered.

NIAGARA SHIP CANAL.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, unless gentlemen insist that the special order shall be taken up. I hope they will allow us to go on and pass one or two appropriation bills, that the Senate may have something to do.

The SPEAKER. The special order after the morning hour to-day is the consideration of the Niagara ship-canal bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask gentlemen to postpone it until to-morrow, and let us go on with appropriation bills.

Mr. ARNOLD. I will consent to have it postponed until Wednesday next.

Mr. STEVENS. I then move that it be postponed until Wednesday morning.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. With the understanding that it shall come up at that hour. We do not want it to lose its place.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Is there not a special order for Wednesday already?

The SPEAKER. There is, after the morning hour. But this would come up immediately after the reading of the Journal and before the reconstruction bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Before the motion is put I desire to inquire whether any other measure which has been postponed would come in before this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this being a special order, if postponed until Wednesday, it will come up the very first thing after the reading of the Journal, unless the constitutional amendment should come over from Tuesday. If the House should be still engaged upon that at the adjournment on Tuesday, it will come up as the unfinished business immediately after the reading of the Journal on Wednesday.

Mr. DAWES. I hope it will not be postponed as a special order.

The SPEAKER. It is a special order now, and must be postponed as such.

Mr. DAWES. Then I trust it will be postponed until some other day. There is business of importance to come in after the constitutional amendment shall be disposed of, which the House should pass upon at an early day.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report back from the Committee on the Judiciary joint resolution of the House No. 126, declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College. It is important that it should be acted upon at once.

Mr. LE BLOND. I object.

Mr. WILSON. I move to suspend the rules, for the purpose of having the joint resolution considered now.

The question was put; and two thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended.

Mr. WILSON. I now report the joint resolution, and I ask the previous question upon it.

The preamble to the joint resolution recites that the inhabitants and local authorities of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee rebelled against the Government of the United States, and have continued in a state of armed rebellion for more than three years, and were in a state of armed rebellion on the 8th of November, 1864.

The joint resolution provides that the States mentioned in the preamble are not entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President and Vice President of the United States for the term of office commencing on the 4th of March, 1865, and that no electoral votes shall be received or counted from those States concerning the choice of President and Vice President for that term.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will hear me for one moment.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. MALLORY. I would suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that the case provided for by the joint resolution which he reports ought to be met by the two Houses of Congress when they meet in joint session to receive and count the votes of the various States for President and Vice President. I do not see why we should prejudice the matter now. We are competent to settle it when we come to count the votes.

I would say further to the gentleman from Iowa that I have been instructed by the Committee on Rules of this House to introduce an amendment to the rules concerning the very case contemplated by this joint resolution, and directing the mode in which any contest as to the right of any State to cast its vote shall be settled by the two Houses of Congress in their joint session. If the gentleman will allow me, I will send to the Clerk and ask him to read the report which I have been instructed to make by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to its being read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the following be added to the joint rules of the two Houses:

23. The two Houses shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock, p. m., on the second Wednesday in February next succeeding the meeting of the Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be their Presiding Officer; one teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes; and said tellers having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses then assembled, shall make a list of the votes as shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been counted, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

If, upon the reading of any such certificate by the tellers, any question shall arise in regard to counting the votes therein certified, the same, having been stated by the Presiding Officer, shall be submitted, first by the President of the Senate to that body, and then by the Speaker to the House of Representatives, and no question shall be decided affirmatively, and no vote objected to shall be counted except by the concurrent votes of the two Houses, said votes of the two Houses to be reported to and declared by the Presiding Officer; and upon any such question there shall be no debate; and any other question pertinent to the object for which the two Houses are assembled may be submitted and determined in like manner. At such joint meeting of the two Houses, seats shall be provided, as follows: for the President of the Senate the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, a chair immediately upon his left; for the Senators, in the body of the Hall upon the right of the Presiding Officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the Hall not occupied by the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon either side of the Speaker's platform.

Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared; and no recess shall be taken, unless a question shall have arisen in regard to counting any of such votes, in which case it shall be competent for either House, upon motion made and submitted by its own Presiding Officer, to direct a recess not beyond the next day at the hour of one o'clock, p. m.

Mr. WILSON. I think there is a majority of the House in favor of the passage of the joint resolution which I have reported, but I think it very doubtful whether a majority of the House would be in favor of the adoption of the rule which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] has had read at the Clerk's desk. And as it is very important that this question shall be determined at once, inasmuch as the opening and counting of the electoral votes is to take place next Wednesday week, I think we had better act on the joint resolution now, leaving the proposed amendment of the rules to be reported and discussed at the proper time. I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. MALLORY. If the gentleman will allow me, I will offer the rule as a substitute for the joint resolution, and let the sense of the House be taken on it.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir, I cannot do that. That would create a good deal of discussion, I am satisfied, from the provision made there for the determination of the question by the two Houses sitting in the same Hall. I therefore move the previous question on the joint resolution.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the House will vote it down, and let the Senate have something to do with the settlement of the question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the joint resolution was engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. WILSON moved the previous question on the preamble.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the preamble was engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. WILSON moved the previous question on the passage of the preamble and joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the preamble and joint resolution were passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and joint resolution were passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL MARINE ENGINES.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me first to submit a report from the Committee on Naval Affairs on the subject of naval marine engines?

Mr. STEVENS. I will, if the report is not to be acted on now.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. It is not. I am instructed to ask that the report be laid on the table, and be printed with the accompanying documents and testimony.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would like to know how much testimony is to be printed, and what amount of documents. I am told that the printing will cost nearly one thousand dollars. Is it all to be printed?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. It is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to have this report laid on the table, and ordered to be printed with the testimony and accompanying papers. Is there objection?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not object so far as the making of the report is concerned; but I do object to ordering the printing of the testimony and documents till I know more about it.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. The gentleman cannot object to the report being made; as the Committee on Naval Affairs has leave to report at any time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to strike out that part of the motion which provides for printing the "accompanying papers," so that the report alone shall be printed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I desire to state that a large number of documents have been received and a large amount of testimony taken by the committee in this case. The report embodies, as far as is practicable, and, as I believe, truly and justly, the contents of the testimony and of the documents. Still, the subject is one of very considerable importance, and I think that the testimony and documents will prove of great importance, and should be printed. However, I am willing to submit to the House the question of printing.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understand from my friend from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] who sits behind me, and who is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that it was determined in that committee that the question of the expediency of printing these documents should be left to the decision of the House.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I have no objection to the House disposing of the question with regard to printing this testimony and the accompanying documents.

Mr. SPALDING. It was the understanding of the committee that the question of printing should be left to the House.

The amendment of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, was agreed to.

The motion of Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, as amended, was adopted.

MARY E. BOULIGNY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is still entitled to the floor.

Mr. THAYER. I ask my colleague to yield for a moment, that I may obtain consent to withdraw certain papers.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. THAYER. I ask leave, on behalf of Mrs. Mary E. Bouigny, to withdraw from the files of the House certain papers relating to her claim, which has been before the Committee on Private Land Claims. This claim is now before a similar committee of the Senate, and the papers are wanted for use there.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield for positively the last time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Objection was made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot make that motion unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania yields for that purpose.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I decline to yield. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and proceed to the consideration of the special order, the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1866.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read by clauses for amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by clauses for amendment.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. The Clerk has just read the following item:

For the construction and repair of vessels of the Navy, $21,570,000.

I move to amend by striking out "$21,570,000," and inserting in lieu thereof "$24,530,000."

As I understand, Mr. Chairman, among the estimates which were submitted by the Department for the expenses of the ensuing year, no estimates were made for any new constructions either of machinery or of vessels. The estimate which came from the Navy Department for the item of construction and repair of vessels was $24,530,000. The Committee of Ways and Means have stricken off from that item $2,960,000, reducing the appropriation to a sum which is believed by the Navy Department to be inadequate to meet the necessary demands for that purpose during the year. I went over the items for this bureau, and came to the conclusion that some reduction could be made in that item; but since that time I have received a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, calling attention to some of the wants of the Department which were necessarily embraced under that item, and which require that the sum estimated for shall be appropriated. I will state that among those is a sum rendered necessary to carry out the act of Congress in relation to finishing the Puritan and the Dictator, and also $150,000, which the Committee on Naval Affairs recommended the House to authorize as an advance to Paul S. Forbes on his contract for completing the sloop-of-war Idaho—not an addition to his contract price, but simply an advance of that amount before the completion of the vessel, the vessel being abundantly worth more than the amount which will have been advanced, including this.

I send to the Clerk's desk a letter, and ask that it may be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON,
January 23, 1865.

SIR: The estimate submitted by this Department for the ensuing fiscal year for the construction and repair of vessels is $24,530,000. This amount has been reduced $2,960,000 by the Committee of Ways and Means, leaving the proposed appropriation $21,570,000. This sum, in the opinion of the Department, will not be sufficient for the necessities of the service. The action of the last Congress increased the expense of completing some of the new work in progress, and to enable the Department to carry out the wishes of Congress and to provide for the necessary wants of the Navy, I respectfully ask that an effort be made to have the full amount asked for appropriated.

Very respectfully,
GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. A. H. RICE,
Chairman Naval Committee House of Representatives.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, the Committee of Ways and Means, desirous to reduce these appropriations as much as they could without injury to the public service, did reduce the estimates of the sum mentioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts, I believe, some three million dollars, and we hoped that the Department would acquiesce in it. But it appears from the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, which has been read, that he desires and deems it necessary that these estimates should be restored. If I understood the amendment, it simply provides for restoring the estimates of the Department. Now, I am not very desirous that the Navy Department shall be hampered, nor do I pretend, nor does the Committee of Ways and Means, to know enough to overrule the amendment, although we did believe the Department could get along with $21,000,000. But it is for the House to determine whether the estimates shall be restored.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE. I move to strike out of the clause "for the construction and repair of vessels of the Navy, $24,530,000," the words "construction and." That will carry out, as I understand, the view expressed by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think that the gentleman from Maine accomplishes his purpose by the amendment. He ought to insert the words "completion and," so that it will read "for the completion and repair," &c.

Mr. PIKE. I accept that as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I doubt whether the amendment will answer the purpose. Last year we authorized the construction of certain vessels. I understand that several are under way and others are contracted for. I doubt whether they have commenced the construction of some of them, but I do not know how that is.

Mr. PIKE. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that they are now upon the stocks in a greater or less stage of construction. There are some fifty or sixty vessels of all kinds and when completed they will swell our Navy to nearly seven hundred vessels, abundantly sufficient for all present purposes.

Mr. STEVENS. If the Committee on Naval Affairs are of the opinion that the amendment is right, I, of course, do not object.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For fuel for the Navy, and for the transportation and expenses thereof, $7,680,000.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move to add: For bounties to seamen, &c., $1,000,000.

I ask the Clerk to read the letter which I send up.

The Clerk read, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 26, 1865.

SIR: The Chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting informs me that after the estimates of that bureau had been submitted to Congress for the next fiscal year, the President, on the 20th December, 1864, issued a call for three hundred thousand more men. This call was not anticipated by the bureau, and consequently there will be an additional appropriation required to pay bounties to persons enlisting in the naval service under it. He asks an appropriation of $1,000,000 to meet this demand, and I recommend that the request be granted.

Very respectfully, &c.,

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, Chairman Committee of Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS moved to add the following: For the purchase of land adjoining the Boston navy-yard, $130,000.

I send to the Clerk to be read the communications upon which that amendment is based.

The Clerk read, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 20, 1865.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of a communication, dated the 18th instant, addressed to me by the chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, relative to the importance of purchasing certain property with the view of acquiring more water front for the Brooklyn and Boston navy-yards.

These matters have been brought to the attention of Congress heretofore, and on this occasion I consider it simply necessary to ask the committee, as Rear Admiral Smith suggests, to report the respective amounts named in the estimates of the bureau for the proposed purchases.

Very respectfully, &c.,
GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, Chairman Committee Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

No. 4.] NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, January 18, 1865.

SIR: I beg leave to ask that you request the Committee of Ways and Means to report the amount estimated for the purchase of the Ruggles property adjoining the navy-yard, Brooklyn, as recommended in your letter of 15th December last to Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker of House of Representatives.

This property will be a most valuable acquisition to the yard, as, in consequence of the very limited wharf accommodations, we are almost constantly paying demurrage on vessels having cargoes to land and ship at this great depot of stores. The number of vessels visiting the yard for this purpose is very large, while most of the wharf room is occupied by the vessels of the Navy under repairs or fitting for sea; consequently, these private vessels are obliged to wait their turn to unload, thereby causing great expense to the Government, and delay in the delivery of stores.

This Ruggles wharf property will afford good landings, and has long been much needed; the owner is dead, and the executor offers the property at my estimate of its value. It will be worth more to the United States than double the cost at the price stated, for, in addition to the gain of territory and wharf accommodation, the removal of the old stores, which have long been a nuisance, will be effected.

The property embraced within the lines of the navy-yard wall, United States street, Little street, and the river, does not all belong to the Ruggles estate; there are four lots belonging to other parties, as seen on the sketch forwarded with your letter to Congress, and it is very desirable that the purchase should include these lots, so that Government property may bound on United States and Little streets.

The whole cost, as near as I can ascertain, will be $102,000. I would also request that the Committee report $135,000 for the purchase of the water front near the navy-yard at Boston, an appropriation for which was rejected at the last session of Congress under the plea that Congress would pass an act to authorize Government to seize any property needed for public use. I am, however, unable to find that any such act has been consummated.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,
JOSEPH SMITH,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. GIDEON WELLES, Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that the amendment is not in accordance with any provision of law. It is not for the continuation of any work, not authorized by law, and therefore not in order. It is not an amendment for the support of the Government, but simply for the purchase of land.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules the amendment out.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I offer the following amendment:

Insert under the heading of "Boston navy-yard" the following:

For completion of joiners' building, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I offer the following amendment. I suppose that it will be ruled out of order, but it is my duty to submit it.

For the purchase of the ground adjoining Brooklyn navy-yard, $102,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the same point of order upon that amendment as I did on the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (Mr. DAWES having taken the chair,) moved to amend by inserting after line two hundred and seventy-four the following:

That hereafter no appointment shall be made to the naval school except the appointments at large now authorized to be made by the President, unless it be upon the recommendation of a member of the House of Representatives, and from the district represented by such member; provided that if there shall be any vacancies in said naval school from States or districts not having a representation in Congress, such vacancies shall be equitably apportioned by the Secretary of the Navy among the Representatives in Congress from the States and districts which are represented.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If I can have the attention of the committee while I explain this amendment, I apprehend there will be no objection to it by a single member.

Mr. KINNEY. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he has left out the Delegates from the Territories.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will yield to an amendment of that kind.

By the law approved July 16, 1862, it was provided as follows:

"And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy, so soon after the 5th of March as possible, to notify in writing each member and delegate of any vacancy which may exist in his district, and if said member or delegate neglects to recommend a candidate by the 1st of July in that year, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to fill the vacancy."

I know I watch these things as closely as I can when they are passed by the House. I certainly did not understand the effect of this law; and I do not believe a single member of the House, except the one who drafted it, did understand it. By looking at it one would suppose that it was fair enough; and it would be, if construed differently. For instance, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] or the gentleman from Iowa behind me [Mr. WILSON] had neglected, when an appointment was due them, and after being notified, to fill a vacancy, it would be proper enough to say that the Secretary of the Navy should have the power of filling such vacancy. But, sir, the construction which I understand has been given to the law has operated in this way: that every district in the rebellious States which has not been represented by a member in Congress has been construed as being a vacancy, and the Secretary of the Navy entitled to fill all those vacancies. That has taken from us the power which the representatives of the people have guarded, perhaps more strictly and more justly than any other—the power of retaining these appointments in their hands.

Mr. MALLORY. I would inquire of the gentleman whether the Secretary of the Navy has complied with another requisition of the act—that is, that the appointee shall come from the Congressional district.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That I cannot answer.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not see how he could comply with the law in that respect.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I know that if the Secretary of the Navy has filled all these vacancies, he has taken away that right which, as I before stated, we have guarded more vigilantly than any other. Every part of the country should be represented equally in the military and naval schools. The amendment I have offered repeals the existing law to the extent I have indicated; and where there are vacancies from rebel districts, the Secretary of the Navy is obliged, under my amendment, to apportion the midshipmen equitably among the members of Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether it is true that the Secretary of the Navy has filled, by appointment to the Naval School, all the vacancies which have occurred within the limits of the seceded States.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that such is the case.

Mr. HOLMAN. As he is required under the law to appoint from the vacant districts, I would inquire whether he has appointed midshipmen residing in those vacant districts?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The provision I have read does not require the Secretary to fill the vacancy from the districts, and it is a matter of the greatest complaint that the Secretary of the Navy has gone into particular localities and made those appointments in large numbers. I understand that from one little town in New Jersey no less than six appointments have been appointed to the Naval Academy.

Mr. STEVENS. It is very clear that by the law to which the gentleman from Illinois has referred we never contemplated filling the vacancies from the rebel States. It is very clear that we contemplated appointments from the States which were represented here, and they were to be appointed by the members here; and by what authority the Secretary of the Navy has gone outside of the States represented in this Hall, and filled vacancies from other quarters, I do not know. Why, sir, if he were to carry out that law according to his construction of it he must give notice to Mr. Crawford of Georgia, to Mr. Marshall of Kentucky, to Mr. Bocoek of Virginia, and other men down in the rebel States, who were members here once, to come and fill the vacancies from their districts; and then, under the old law which required that the vacancies must be filled from those districts, he must appoint from those districts, and there would be representatives at West Point and at Newport from every one of the rebel States.

I am astonished that any Secretary could construe the law so as to suppose that he or anybody else could be permitted to appoint midshipmen from rebel districts. Before making the appointments he must first give notice. To whom? To the members from those districts; and as there is no member from any one of them, how absurd it would be for him to attempt to fill any one of those vacancies. The law contemplates that the member shall fill the vacancy, unless, after notice, the member fails to do so. I do not precisely remember what the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is, but I hope that some law will be passed to remedy this evil. I would be willing to increase the number of midshipmen, in so many words, by one from each district, and give the appointment to the member from that district; but the idea that appointments are to be made from rebel districts seems to me an absurdity. If the gentleman will move that each district represented in Congress shall have two or three or more additional midshipmen, so as to negative the idea that the rebel States are entitled to any, I will vote for it.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that under the law which has been read by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] the Secretary of the Navy has not been guilty of so flagrant an outrage as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] would impute to him. When a vacancy exists in the Naval Academy from any congressional district in the United States, according to that law it becomes the duty of the Secretary to notify the Representative in Congress of that fact. Well, now, if there happens to be no Representative from one of the congressional districts of the United States, is it not impossible for the Secretary to execute the duty thus imposed upon him? And if that be so, the object of the law being to secure a pupil in the Naval Academy from that district, is it not evidently his duty, under the intention of the law, to go on and make the appointment? It would be impossible for him to give the notice from the fact that there is no Representative from the district.

Now, I contend that these States of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania speaks are all in the Union, that there are congressional districts in those States, and that the people of those States have the right, whenever they choose to do so, to elect Representatives to this Congress, and the men so elected, if the House believes, on their application for seats, that they have been legally elected, have the right to take their seats in this House.

It is the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to give notice to the member of Congress that there is a vacancy from his district. Suppose there were no Representative from the district of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Secretary could give no notice; it would be impossible for him to do so. Does the gentleman contend that he would have no right in that case to go on and make the appointment as though he had given the notice? Believing, as I do, that these States are in the Union, that these districts are congressional districts and have a right at any time to send Representatives here, I contend that the Secretary of the Navy, in the exercise of the power mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Illinois, did not transcend the law at all. But, at the same time, I wish to see the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois adopted, because I think that this is a power which ought not to be given to the Secretary of the Navy. I want the power taken away from him and conferred upon members of Congress, and these appointments distributed among them pro rata. I therefore favor the amendment.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I surely am not an advocate for any irregular appointment to the Naval Academy or to the Military Academy, or to any other Government institution, or for any transaction by any Department of the Government without authority of law. If I remember right, this subject is not now brought into the House for the first time. It was brought to the attention of the House a year or two ago, and again last year. And according to my recollection of the circumstances, they were something like this: after certain States went into rebellion, and after the cadets at the Naval Academy from those States had retired from that institution, a large number of vacancies were left to be filled. There was no law governing or regulating the appointments under such circumstances, and the President of the United States took upon himself the authority of filling the vacancies in the Naval Academy according to the rule which governs him in the appointment of cadets at large. Gentlemen will see that when we were about commencing a great war, the last thing that should be left unattended to was the proper education of officers for the naval service. And I understand that the President did, at that time, fill up the Academy with cadets to supply the places of those who had retired from the institution. Gentlemen will remember that Congress subsequently passed an act legalizing the acts of the President done under such circumstances.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of my friend from Illinois to an act of Congress approved May 21, 1864. If I remember correctly, the following provision of that act emanated from my friend from Illinois:

"For expenses of professors, watchmen, and others, and contingencies for the United States Naval Academy, $101,831 55: Provided, That no money appropriated for the support of the Naval Academy shall be applied to the support of any midshipman hereafter appointed not in strict conformance with the provisions of law for appointing midshipmen to the Naval Academy."

Now, if the gentleman from Illinois has cognizance of any appointments made without authority of law, or in nonconformity to the law, since May 21, 1864, then I say that the remarks which he makes are quite pertinent. But otherwise it seems to me that he must have forgotten the action of Congress a year ago.

Mr. CHANLER addressed the Chair.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I will say that it is a question of the construction of that law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to suggest an amendment which will not militate against the object of his amendment? It is that, in case of redistricting congressional districts under the law fixing the census of the United States, no congressional district shall be left without at least one vacancy in the Naval and Military Academies of the United States, such vacancy to be filled by the Representative in Congress of that district. My reason for offering this amendment is, that under the redistricting of congressional districts throughout the Union there have been many congressional districts left without any vacancy in the Military Academy, and I think in the Naval Academy also. I therefore propose to offer this amendment in order to check what was asserted by the heads of Departments to be a difficulty which there was no law to provide against. I offer that as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not see how Congress can cure the evil to which the gentleman refers. Each State is alike under the law. Two midshipmen are to be appointed from each congressional district; but if there have been changes made in these congressional districts, it is necessary for the Department to assign and apportion the appointments according to equity and justice.

Mr. CHANLER. I would remark to the gentleman from Illinois that the difficulty arises from the mixing of counties. The heads of Departments, in making these appointments from the counties, have left districts without a representative in the Naval or Military Academy. And I propose that, instead of redistricting by counties as heretofore, it shall be done by the district itself.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not see how it is possible for the gentleman's amendment to cure the evil which he suggests. These things must be left to the Department. Under the law, each member has a right to make an appointment whenever there may be a vacancy; and when these districts are reapportioned, it is, as I have said, a matter for reassignment by the Navy Department. I do not see how we can make any law which will meet the exigencies of every case.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois contains one phrase which I suggest to him the propriety of changing. He uses, I believe, the phrase "shall be apportioned among the Representatives of districts," &c. My impression is that there is some misapprehension of the mode in which the members of the House of Representatives have hitherto participated actually, but not by law, in the designation of cadets. There is no law on the statute-book giving any Representative any authority to make any nomination except the proviso of the last session; and any such law has always been studiously avoided by previous Congresses, because it would be a plain infraction of the Constitution, which confers upon the President the power of appointment. The way in which we came to have anything to do with the appointment of cadets, either to West Point or to the Naval Academy, was this: in order to stop the perpetual attacks upon those institutions, and as a sort of sop to the Cerberus that were howling at them, the Administration—I do not know how long ago, twenty years perhaps—made a rule for their own guidance, that they would call upon the member of the district and invite from him a suggestion or a recommendation of a person to be appointed, which recommendation has, on the President or the head of the Department, exactly the same effect as, and no other effect than, a recommendation as to the appointment of any other officer whose appointment is intrusted to the President. It can have no more effect than that.

Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois goes, I think, beyond what is necessary to accomplish a very proper purpose, by using that phrase "apportioned among the Representatives." If he will use the words, "apportioned among the congressional districts," he will have it exactly as the law now requires it to be, and will remedy the evils which he wishes to remedy. If the gentleman will not accept this suggestion and modify the phraseology of his amendment, I shall move to amend by striking out the words "Representatives of districts," and inserting "congressional districts."

Mr. KASSON. I wish to call the attention of the mover of the amendment to what will probably be a practical difficulty in the administration of the law under that amendment. The gentleman proposes that these appointments shall be equitably apportioned among the different congressional districts or Representatives, which, practically, will be one and the same thing. There are more congressional districts within the limits of the States represented here than in those which have no Representatives upon this floor. It is necessary, it seems to me, that there should be given in the amendment some indication of the preference in those cases to be given to different districts; and I call the gentleman's attention to the propriety of a further amendment which shall specify that that preference is to be given to districts that have heretofore received the fewest appointments to the Academy. I shall therefore now, if it be admissible, and, if not, at the proper time, propose to add this proviso:

Provided, That in such equitable apportionment he shall give the preference to districts which have heretofore received the fewest appointments to the Naval School.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The Secretary of the Navy can do that under the provisions of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois accept the modification proposed by the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like to hear it again.

The Clerk read the proviso proposed by Mr. KASSON.

Mr. CRESWELL. Is it proposed by that amendment to give the appointments to the new States to the exclusion of the old States?

Mr. KASSON. The effect of that proposition will be that, if there are one or two appointments to be made on account of the unrepresented districts, the Secretary of the Navy or the President, as the case may be, will first take the nominations from those districts that have heretofore had the fewest appointments. I insist that, in the nominations to be made on account of the unrepresented districts, the benefit of the apportionment should first be given to those districts that have had the fewest appointments heretofore.

Mr. CRESWELL. Then I am right, and the gentleman's design is to give to the new States to the exclusion of the old ones.

Mr. KASSON. Not exactly to the exclusion of the old districts. If the old district is represented and the new district is not, then I say that the exclusion shall apply to the old district.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman from Iowa mean to say that where the President of the United States has appointed half a dozen young men from a district, they shall be counted in the apportionment of that district?

Mr. KASSON. I think that the gentleman will see that that precise difficulty is avoided by the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. Then they are all alike, for the law provides that each district shall have two. Under that there can be no inequality.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman will see that this amendment only applies to the representation of rebellious States; there are not as many of them as there are loyal districts; and when we say that the President or Secretary shall apportion them equitably we leave a portion of the districts which will not receive one. The question therefore is, what districts shall be preferred?

Mr. STEVENS. There can be no difference between the districts, for the law says that each shall have the same number. Therefore that portion of the gentleman's amendment cannot mean anything unless that where the President shall select half a dozen from one district they shall be counted to that district.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman from Iowa allow me?

Mr. KASSON. As soon as I have answered the objection of the gentleman's colleague. If six be appointed from any one district, I propose in the equitable apportionment, under my amendment, that the district which has had six shall be passed until the others, who have had none, shall be satisfied. That is the effect of my amendment.

Mr. THAYER. I ask the gentleman whether in his opinion there is any equity in allowing States which have been recently admitted into the Union to go back and make up the number of appointments which the old States have had before the new States were formed? In order to make myself a little more clear: for instance, Massachusetts and New York have appointed to the Naval Academy some fifty or sixty cadets, while the State of Nevada, which has just been admitted, has not had one appointment. Now, shall Nevada appoint fifty or sixty cadets before New York or Massachusetts shall be allowed to appoint any more cadets? That is the effect of the amendment. It is to allow the new States for the time that they had no existence.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is not in order at this time.

Mr. KASSON. Let me answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania. In making these appointments several have been made from a single district.

Mr. GANSON. What district?

Mr. KASSON. Excuse me; the gentlemen about me seem to be familiar with it.

Mr. PIKE. Six were appointed upon the recommendation of a single gentleman from Iowa.

A MEMBER. Senator GRIMES.

Mr. KASSON. I do not propose to call any gentleman's conduct in question. If he can get that number, so much the better for him; but let us take care for the future that no such inequitable apportionment shall take place.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask my colleague to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. KASSON. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. At the time these appointments were made to which my colleague directly referred, the State of Iowa was divided into two districts, and represented by only two members. It may have been after the redistricting the State into six districts. Now I do not propose to have those appointments charged to me, or to the district I have the honor to represent. The Secretary of the Navy telegraphed to one of the Senators from Iowa, requesting him to forward the names of six boys for a class then about to be formed in the Naval School. In response to this the names were forwarded and the appointments made. It does not appear that they were all located in one district in the State. Two or three were from the district I now represent, and a like number from the second district. I presume that the object of my colleague is to declare that the Representatives of the first and second districts of Iowa shall not be entitled to appoint any more until the other districts shall have the same number, thus brought about by the Secretary of the Navy. I only state these facts that it may not be supposed that through the recommendation of myself, or Mr. Vandever, my colleague then, these appointments were made.

Mr. KASSON. The point of my amendment does not apply to the district of Iowa any more than it does to any other district. It was offered irrespective of the apportionment of Iowa, and I have no objection to modifying it so that it shall read "on the recommendation of the Representative." My object is to specify an equitable rule which shall govern these apportionments irrespective of locality. And I say to the gentleman from New York who proposed the amendment, when it was found in the reapportionment of Iowa that the actual Representatives from the districts of that State was not from one of the new districts under that new apportionment, the Secretary of the Navy immediately allowed a Representative to such new district; and hence his amendment is unnecessary, unless the rule has been changed. I have often thought that in these reapportionments we should give the preference in the appointments to those districts which have not had an equal representation in the Naval Academy. If gentlemen do not agree to that, what would they think of the converse proposition, that these appointments, there not being enough to satisfy all the districts, should be made from the district which have heretofore had the most? Would gentlemen think that just? If not, let them take the other rule, and say that the preference shall be given to those districts that heretofore have had the fewest appointments.

Mr. GANSON. I would inquire if the effect of the amendment would not be to exclude the districts of the old States until the new States had had an equal number.

Mr. KASSON. The effect probably would be, so far as the remaining thirty or forty are concerned, to give preference to the newer States over the older ones.

As I said before, I am willing to modify my proposition, if that will suit gentlemen any better, by saying, "from districts not heretofore represented, upon the nomination of the member of the districts."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the question now before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. It is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa to the amendment.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, I will send to the desk an amendment to be read; and will ask the gentleman from Iowa to accept it as a substitute for his amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, That each congressional district of the loyal States shall be entitled to three midshipmen in the Naval Academy, instead of two, as now provided by law.

Mr. KASSON. I cannot accept that.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the amendment will be voted down, and then I will offer a substitute.

It seems to me we ought to legislate with some consistency. We have this morning passed a joint resolution, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, declaring that the rebel States shall not be represented in the electoral college. Now by what principle is it that they are to be represented in the Military and Naval Academies? By what principle is it that any district in a rebel State is to be entitled to send a cadet either to West Point, or to the Naval Academy until they again are loyal States, and represented in this House?

But the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] and all the amendments go upon the ground that they are entitled to representation, and if they do not avail themselves of that right, then the appointments shall be distributed among the other States.

Mr. KASSON. My amendment is proposed in consequence of the amendments which propose to give the representation to members of Congress instead of the Secretary of the Navy or the President, as the case may be. If the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] goes to the exclusion of all that class of appointments, that will be another proposition, and I have not expressed myself upon that at all.

Mr. STEVENS. It seems to me we had better vote down both propositions, and I will propose that, in addition to those now allowed by law, one midshipman shall be appointed for each congressional district, to be appointed on the nomination of the member of Congress from such district; and that no midshipman shall be appointed for any district not represented in Congress.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I now offer the following amendment:

One midshipman, in addition to those now allowed by law, shall be appointed for each congressional district and Territory, to be appointed on the nomination of the present members of Congress and delegate from said districts and Territories respectively; but no midshipman shall be appointed for any district not represented in Congress.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he intends by his amendment to increase the number of midshipmen in the Naval Academy fifty per cent.

Mr. STEVENS. Just exactly that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as a substitute for mine.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

And each member of Congress shall appoint a board of three competent persons, who shall examine all candidates for admission, and the candidate approved by said examiners shall be nominated by the member of Congress.

Mr. SPALDING. I think the gentleman had better put this provision in a separate joint resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I prefer to have it in this bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to detain the committee by discussing my amendment. I think the country is entitled to the services in the Army and Navy of the most promising young men who can be brought into these branches of the public service. I dare say that every member of this Congress would exercise a sound discretion in the selection of cadets for the Naval Academy, but possibly as much cannot be assumed for our successors. I am, therefore, in favor of a board of examination in each district who shall select a competent person. If I may be allowed to refer to Massachusetts we have there for many years had in our colleges forty-eight open scholarships. Our board of education from year to year examine all candidates for admission without reference to anything but moral and intellectual qualifications. The results have been that we have not only educated a class of competent persons for the highest domestic and public duties of the country, but we are also elevating the colleges themselves by introducing into them a set of aspiring and competent, and moral young men.

Now, I believe the fact would be somewhat the same if we were to admit to the Academy at West Point and to the Naval Academy only those young men who, upon examination, appear to be best qualified for the places, and I submit that no member of Congress representing the people ought to exercise this high trust for his individual or political benefit. It is a trust which he should exercise in the service of the country for the benefit of the country, and the best way of exercising that trust is through an examination by competent men, and then let the place be given to the young man who appears to be best qualified.

Mr. STEVENS. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. If the law gives me the authority to make these nominations I propose to exercise it myself, and not leave it to anybody else. Moreover, there is one of the strictest boards ever constituted anywhere which examines the candidates for admission to this Naval Academy.

Mr. GANSON. I was about to remark that these young men are now subjected to a rigid examination. I dare say the gentleman from Massachusetts has had some candidates rejected whom he had recommended, because the examination was so severe.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN's amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. PIKE. I move to amend the clause in relation to the Naval Observatory by striking out the words:

And there is hereby authorized to be appointed in said office one additional aid, at an annual salary of $1,333 33, and said amount is hereby appropriated therefor.

Last year there were four aids in the Naval Observatory receiving salaries of $1,000 each. It was said then that they could do the business with three aids, and they proposed to divide the $4,000 between the three aids, and we assented to that proposition.

Now, it appears from this provision that it is proposed to increase the salaries of these gentlemen. I think it is a kind of indirect way of raising salaries that should not be encouraged, and for that reason I make the motion to strike out.

Mr. STEVENS. This provision is one which comes recommended by the Naval Department. I am not a very good astronomer myself; perhaps the gentleman from Maine is more capable of judging of such matters as this than I am; but still I prefer to trust the Department, who know more about this whole subject than either of us.

Mr. PIKE. I will say in reply that I do not act upon my own knowledge at all, for I should defer to the superior knowledge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania or the conductors of this Naval Observatory. I merely repeat the statement which they made last year that they could do the business with three aids.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise a point of order on the following clauses of the bill:

For pay of clerks in the Ordnance department at the several navy-yards, in lieu of the present per diem pay, viz: For salary of one clerk at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, navy-yard, $1,200.

For salary of one clerk at $1,200, and one at $1,000 per annum, at Boston navy-yard, $2,200.

For salary of one clerk at $1,200 per annum, and one clerk at $1,000 per annum, at the New York navy-yard, $2,200.

For salary of one clerk at the Philadelphia navy-yard, $1,200.

For salary of one clerk at $1,400, one clerk at $1,000, one draughtsman at $1,600, one analytical chemist at $2,500, one assistant pyrotechnist at $1,400, and one keeper of magazine at $480 per annum, at the Washington navy-yard, $15,180.

It seems to me that they are changes of law, rather than appropriations to carry out law.

The CHAIRMAN. (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair.) The Chair sustains the point of order, and holds that it is independent legislation in an appropriation bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know that these clauses increase the pay of the employees referred to. They merely fix their pay and make their positions permanent instead of being temporary.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means what the per diem of temporary clerks is now?

Mr. STEVENS. My impression is that it is $3 50.

Mr. WILSON. If this be for giving them the same pay only, I presume it is better to let it remain as it is, instead of making these clerkships permanent clerkships at fixed salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. STEVENS. As that completes the bill I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Before that motion is put I offer the following amendment, to come in as additional sections at the end of the bill:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a Board of Admiralty, which shall consist of the vice admiral and one rear admiral, one commodore, one captain, one commander, and one lieutenant commander, over which the Secretary of the Navy or the officer highest in rank present shall preside; and when the subject under consideration shall appertain to the duties of any bureau in the Navy Department, the chief of such bureau shall be a member of the board, and entitled to sit and vote on the consideration of the subject.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the board shall deliberate in common and advise the Secretary on any matters submitted by him relating to naval organization, naval legislation, the construction, equipment, and armament of vessels, navy-yards, and other naval establishments, and the direction, employment, and disposition of the naval forces in time of war. All such opinions shall be recorded.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no vessel-of-war shall be built or materially altered, nor any guns of new construction ordered or adopted, nor any engine for any vessel-of-war adopted or ordered, nor any permanent structure for naval service executed, until the plans, estimates, proposals, and contracts for the same shall have been submitted to the board, and its opinion and advice thereon communicated in writing to the Secretary; nor shall any patented invention be bought or adopted for the naval service without first the opinion of the board thereon having been taken; and all experiments decided to test inventions and naval plans and structures shall be conducted under the inspection of the board, or members thereof named by the Secretary, and submitted to the board for its opinion thereon.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all invitations for plans or proposals for any of the works above mentioned shall be prepared by the board, subject to the approval of the Secretary; and all bids or offers or proposals for the same shall be opened in the presence of the board, and the award made by it, subject to the approval of the Secretary.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary may add to the board, from time to time, other officers of the Navy eligible to the position of chief of bureau, not exceeding three, at any time, for consultation on any of the above subjects. The board may take the opinion of eminent practical engineers, mechanics, machinists, and architects, in their respective branches of art or industry, when in their opinion the public service will be promoted by it, and pay them such reasonable compensation as the Secretary may approve.

Mr. WILSON. I make the point of order that this is independent legislation, and is not in order as an amendment to an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Then I move it as a proviso to the bill—as a limitation on the appropriations granted. I take it that, in that point of view, it is perfectly in order.

Mr. WILSON. I make the same point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Chair does not think that the amendment proposed is, properly speaking, a limitation on the appropriations made in the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Then I move the following as an express limitation:

Provided, That no money appropriated for the naval service shall be expended otherwise than in accordance with the following provision, so far as it is applicable; that is to say, that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a Board of Admiralty, which shall consist, &c.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, if that amendment is considered in order, I wish, before the committee proceed to act upon it, to say a word. A bill similar in substance to that amendment was introduced into the House and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and is now undergoing investigation before that committee. I hope the House will not act upon the subject until that committee shall have made its report.

Mr. WILSON. I make the point of order that the amendment proposes independent legislation and is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Chair does not think that this can be regarded, under the rules, as a proviso limiting the appropriations.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. Is the appeal debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment to the bill. The Chair decides that the amendment is not in order, as being independent legislation in an appropriation bill. From that decision the gentleman from Maryland appeals. The question: Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. DAVIS of Maryland, and Mr. STEELE of New York.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 41; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum voting, the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask that there be a recount. There being no objection, the tellers resumed their places.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 50.

So the decision of the Chair was overruled, and the amendment decided to be in order.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to make some remarks explanatory of the amendment which I have offered. If the committee have patience to hear me at this hour in the evening, I am ready to go on. But it is impossible that a measure of this importance can be passed over without due consideration when I am charged with it.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman from Maryland allow me to make a suggestion? It is now four o'clock; and the gentleman is not to-day in a favorable physical condition for speaking. Therefore, out of courtesy to him, and for the convenience of all of us, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration as a special order, the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1866, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RAILROAD TO NEW YORK.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the construction of a line of railway communication between the cities of Washington and New York, and to constitute the same a public highway and a military road and postal route of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

NAVAL PAINTING BY W. H. POWELL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution authorizing a contract with William H. Powell for a picture for the Capitol.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be reported at length, after which the Chair will ask for objections, if any.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c. That the Joint Committee on the Library be, and they are hereby, directed to enter into a contract with William H. Powell, of the State of Ohio, to paint a picture for the United States, to be placed at the head of one of the grand staircases in the Capitol, illustrative of some naval victory, the particular subject of the painting to be agreed on by the committee and the artist: Provided, That the entire expense of said picture shall not exceed $25,000; and $2,000 shall be paid to said William H. Powell in advance, to enable him to prepare for the work, the remainder of said sum in installments at intervals of not less than one year, the last installment to be retained until the picture is completed and put up.

Mr. PRUYN. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio to modify his resolution by striking out "directed" and inserting "authorized."

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to that. I modify the resolution in that way.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the introduction of the joint resolution?

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules in order to introduce the joint resolution.

The question being taken on the motion, there were, on a division—ayes thirty-two, noes not counted.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SCHENCK and ANCONA were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 31, noes 54; no quorum voting.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at ten minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 31, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL, D. D., of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

UNEMPLOYED GENERALS.

Mr. WADE. I notice, Mr. President, that the Secretary of War, in his return to a resolution of the Senate asking for information concerning the employment of our generals, has made a mistake in one particular that I wish to have rectified. He says, among other things, that "Generals Banks and Lee are before the committee on the conduct of the war." That is a mistake, and a mistake which I wish to have rectified, because it seems to be a standing mistake, and I do not know but that it may interfere with the disposition that the Executive wishes to make of those generals. Now, to set the matter right, I will read our communication with General Banks on the subject:

COMMITTEE-ROOM CONDUCT OF THE WAR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., December 13, 1864.

SIR: I am instructed by the committee on the conduct of the war to inform you that they will meet you to-morrow at ten o'clock, a. m., for the purpose of taking your testimony in relation to the Red river expedition, provided you are to remain in the city and are not otherwise occupied. We do not wish to detain you, or to have our request complied with, if it conflicts at all with your instructions from the President or Secretary of War.

I remain, &c., B. F. WADE, Chairman.
Major General N. P. BANKS, U. S. A.

On the 14th of December, according to this request, General Banks came in and he gave his deposition, which probably took him two hours. Then he was dismissed by us; we did not want him any longer, and had nothing to do with detaining him beyond that. We dismissed him as we do all other witnesses who have given their testimony; but having taken other testimony, about a month after, finding that he was still in the city, we sent for him on the 13th of January to make a little explanation, and he came in and I think it took him about ten minutes. We have not detained him at all except when we took his deposition, and that, as I have said, probably lasted two hours. He seems to have been here from the 13th of December until yesterday, when the War Department reported that we were detaining him here. It is no such thing. We have detained him no more than we have any other witness who has given testimony.

As for General Lee, he appeared before the committee on the 11th of January and gave his testimony, which I suppose took him two hours, and he was discharged by us and I have not seen him since. I wish it to be understood that neither General Banks nor General Lee nor any other general is detained by us a moment after he comes and testifies.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio in favor of the removal of the duty on imported printing paper; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of any bankrupt law; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. CLARK presented the memorial of Frank Pugsley, praying compensation for services rendered the United States as a private soldier from October 17, 1861, to October 24, 1862, being the time which elapsed from the date of his discharge until he had notice of the same; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARLAN presented a petition of citizens of Washington city, District of Columbia, praying the repeal of all laws making it unlawful for county constables to arrest parties charged with crime against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS presented a petition of ministers of the gospel and pastors of the churches at Belvidere, New Jersey, praying that ministers of the gospel may be exempt from military duty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. COLLAMER presented the petition of Lemuel Abbott, praying payment of bounty claimed to be due his son, John J. Abbott, drummer of company I, sixteenth regiment Vermont volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting his adjusted accounts of receipts and expenditures for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of B. A. Froiseth, praying for further legislation to encourage foreign immigration, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the message from the President of the United States transmitting a copy of two treaties between the United States and the King of the Belgians, in relation to the Scheldt dues, reported a bill (S. No. 420) to carry into execution a convention between the United States and Belgium for the extinction of the Scheldt dues; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. NESMITH, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Aria M. Roblas y Robaldo, widow of F. Robaldo, asking to be paid for certain property destroyed by American troops in Mexico, by order of their commanding officer, in the late war with Mexico, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 411) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia," reported it with amendments.

CONGRESSIONAL DIRECTORY.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate directing the committee to inquire into the expediency of ordering a Congressional Directory to be compiled and furnished to Congress at the commencement of each session, have directed me to report a joint resolution on the subject, and to ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution

(S. R. No. 106) providing for the compilation of a Congressional Directory at each session, was read twice by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the compilation of a Congressional Directory, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, to be published by the Superintendent of Public Printing, the first edition for each session to be ready for distribution within one week after the commencement thereof.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will state that the Congressional Directory is now compiled by the Postmaster of the House of Representatives, whose traditional perquisite it is. It has been sold to the Senate at fifty cents a copy; I believe now at seventy-five cents. It only reached us last week, full of errors. Another edition is to be printed, which I suppose we shall have in about a week, at the close of the session, when it will be of no use to us. According to the estimate of the Superintendent of Public Printing, it will cost, if printed at the Government Printing Office, about twenty-five cents a copy for the first thousand, and ten cents a copy for each subsequent thousand. At the short session of 1862 the amount paid for the Congressional Directory out of the contingent fund of the two Houses was $1,132. At the present price of the Directory, which I understand is fifty per cent. higher, that would be $1,698. The Superintendent of Public Printing estimates that it will cost $400 if printed by him, and would doubtless be accurate; and he says he can lay the first edition before us in the first week of the session. The committee did not propose this resolution on economical grounds, although they are certainly worth considering, but with a view to have a Directory, which is absolutely indispensable for the transaction of business here, that should be accurate and be presented to Congress within a reasonable time. It appears also that it can be done at one fourth the cost we now pay for it.

Mr. COLLAMER. Permit me to ask the gentleman out of what fund it is now paid for? Is it out of the contingent fund?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir, out of the contingent fund of the two Houses. The Government pays for it now. If this resolution should be passed, the Government hereafter will pay about one fourth of the present price.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will remark that the particular value of it for our use is the location of the members, where they are staying in Washington; but they do not get their places of settlement, especially those who have families, until after the holidays, in January.

Mr. ANTHONY. The idea of the Superintendent of Public Printing is, that in the first week of the session he will furnish a Directory with the temporary residence of Senators and Representatives, and, as soon as they establish permanent residences, another edition containing their permanent residences; but as many members of both Houses take their permanent residence in the beginning of the session, they can be marked as permanent, and the others as temporary. At all events, we shall get the Directory in a reasonable time and at a reasonable price. I may be wrong in stating that the present price is seventy-five cents; I have heard so; it was fifty cents before, I know.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether the order applies to the present session.

Mr. ANTHONY. No, sir, not to the present session. It is prospective.

Mr. MORRILL. I was going to state the fact, which I have occasion to know, that an application has been made for payment for the present session.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DIXON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 421) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the deaf, and the dumb, and the blind," approved February 16, 1857; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 422) relating to the mail service between New York and the Pacific coast; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to state that I introduce this bill by request. I know nothing of the prices that ought to be paid; but I presume the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads does. I move its reference to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

PEACE MISSIONS TO RICHMOND.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the following resolution; and I ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interests, to furnish to the Senate any information in his power concerning any recent personal communications with the rebel Jefferson Davis, said to have been under executive sanction; and also copies of any correspondence relating thereto.

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest whether it would not be better to so shape the verbiage of the resolution as to refer to the mission of Mr. Blair.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon; I prefer it in its general form.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution? That is the first question.

Mr. JOHNSON. None on my part. I send to the Chair a resolution on the same subject, which, perhaps, the Senator may think more comprehensive.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the body.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if he shall not deem it inconsistent with the public interest, to inform the Senate if any person, and if any, what person, has, with his authority or assent, been in Richmond to negotiate with the president of the so-called confederate States, or with any other person or persons in authority under such States, in relation to a termination of the present war, or with a view to ascertain from such president or persons in authority on what terms or conditions, if any, he or they would be willing to have the said war terminated; and if so, also to inform the Senate what information he has obtained from such agent or person; and he is also requested to inform the Senate, if such person was in Richmond as aforesaid, whether he was authorized or permitted by the President to represent to the confederate authorities on what terms or conditions the President was willing to negotiate in relation to peace, and if so, what such terms and conditions were.

Mr. SUMNER. The resolution which I offer, as the Senate will observe, is much briefer and simpler than that of the Senator from Maryland. In that respect I think that my own is preferable. There are some words employed by the Senator that I should not like to see the Senate adopt in a resolution. The resolution of the Senate speaks of the "confederate authorities;" to my mind they are always the "rebel authorities." In my resolution I characterize the head of the rebellion as "the rebel Jefferson Davis;" and I call upon the President for information relating to any personal communications with "the rebel Jefferson Davis said to have been had recently by executive sanction." It strikes me that the resolution introduced by me covers the whole case, and I doubt the expediency of going into details. I should like to have my resolution read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to the resolution proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, except, perhaps, that I am not sure that it would accomplish his purpose and my purpose and what I supposed to be the purpose of the Senate. It is very desirable that the information asked for by either resolution should be given to the public at the earliest day possible. The report which has gone all over the country that such a negotiation in some form or other has been going on, has caused a good deal of solicitude and a good deal of speculation. If there is no foundation for it, the sooner we know it the better; if there is, the sooner we know it the better. The only objection I have to the resolution offered by my friend from Massachusetts, is that I doubt very much whether he will by it get the information. I do not know that there is any "correspondence" upon the subject; I doubt very much whether there is any "correspondence" on the subject; and if you call only for "correspondence"—

Mr. SUMNER. I call for information.

Mr. JOHNSON. Information as to what? I want to know, in the order of time, first, whether there has been a messenger sent there by the Government or going there with the permission of the Government, to hold any communication with the president of the confederate States, or with any person in authority under such States, in order to ascertain upon what terms they are willing to make peace; and if it is so, whether those terms have been stated to the agent and have been since made known to the President, and that he tell us what those terms are. But I want also to know, and perhaps my friend from Massachusetts will not get that by his call—if that agent has been authorized to state upon what conditions the President of the United States is willing to enter into a negotiation for the termination of the war.

Now, as to the criticism of my friend from Massachusetts upon what the Senator from California calls the "verbiage" of my resolution, that I call the authorities at Richmond "the confederate authorities," I have not the slightest objection to call them "rebel authorities." They have been called "the confederate authorities" over and over again.

Mr. CONNESS. "So-called confederate authorities."

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes "so called;" but I will strike that out, and say "the rebel authorities," for, speaking on the floor of the Senate, I have called them nothing but rebels, and shall continue to call them so until they prove themselves able to establish their independence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland submit his proposition as an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JOHNSON. I would rather have it as I offered it, as an amendment for that reason.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question then is on amending the resolution by striking out the words of the original resolution and substituting the words contained in the resolution of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This may be an important matter, and it may be important in what form the resolution should be adopted. For myself, I prefer that the resolution and amendment should be printed, and come up to-morrow morning.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then we can see them both.

Mr. SUMNER. Is it advisable to let the resolutions go over until to-morrow morning?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think so, and let them be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. But I want the information at once. I should like to have the information to-morrow morning.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. We may not be able to get it by to-morrow morning.

Mr. SUMNER. If Senators desire that the matter shall be postponed until to-morrow morning I shall not press it now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any motion submitted?

Mr. HALE. I move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until to-morrow, and that in the mean time the resolutions and the amendment be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CONDUCT OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HALE. I have a resolution which I wish to present to the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be instructed to inform the Senate whether the argument of the judges advocate on the trial of Franklin W. Smith has been printed by order of the Navy Department, or any officer of that branch of the service, and whether the same has been done at the expense of the Treasury of the United States; how large an addition of the same has been published, and what use has been made of the copies thus published. Also, whether any commissioners, agents, or detectives have been employed by the said Navy Department, or any officer thereof, since July 1, 1864; if so, how many, what sum or sums have been paid them, what instructions were given to them verbally or in writing, either by the Secretary of the Navy or the Assistant Secretary; and especially whether any instructions were given to said detectives or agents, or either of them, by said Secretary or Assistant Secretary, or by any one else for them, or with the knowledge, advice, or consent of either of them, to inquire into the conduct of business transactions of any member of either House of Congress; and also, how much expense has been incurred by such examination, the particulars thereof, the fund from which they have been paid, and the law authorizing the same.

I ask that it be considered now.

Mr. CONNESS. I think that resolution should lie over until the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs is present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If objected to, it must lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. I move, then, that it be printed.

The motion to print was agreed to.

BARRACKS FOR CLERKS.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish the Senate with such information as he may possess relative to the barracks proposed to be erected in Washington for the accommodation of the clerks on detached service, an estimate of the probable cost of the same, and such other statements and suggestions as he may deem proper.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that he had approved and signed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 384) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and extend the charter of the Franklin Fire Insurance Company," approved the 2d of March, 1838; and

A bill (S. No. 363) to amend the charter of the Washington Gas-Light Company.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

At the suggestion of Mr. HARLAN, by unanimous consent, the Vice President was authorized to appoint a member of the Committee on Public Lands in the absence of Mr. HARDING.

COMMITTEE ON CORRUPTIONS.

Mr. POWELL. I move to suspend all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the bill (S. No. 392) supplementary to the act approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads." The object of the bill is to authorize the construction of a railway bridge over the Ohio river at the head of the falls.

Mr. HALE. I hope that will not be taken up. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will not press it now. When the morning hour expired yesterday, the Senate had under consideration a resolution introduced by his colleague, [Mr. DAVIS,] upon which I had the floor, and I was addressing the Senate and was interrupted by the expiration of the morning hour. It is my desire to proceed with the consideration of that resolution at this time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire, as he has entered into a discussion that may probably call for some remarks from other Senators, that it would be better to fix that question for some time besides the morning hour. We have only fifteen minutes of the morning hour now left, and he cannot finish in that time, certainly. I would propose that that subject be fixed for some particular day.

Mr. HALE. I will take the time that is left this morning, if I can.

Mr. POWELL. I do not wish to prevent the Senator from New Hampshire from finishing his remarks; but the bill to which I have called attention is one of great importance, and it is important that it should be acted upon quickly. If the Senate will now take it up, I shall propose to make it the special order for some early day. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] desires some little postponement of it; and I propose to make it the special order for some day in the latter part of the week, if the Senate will take it up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky to take up the bill indicated by him.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I now move that the Senate take up the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution, which had been modified to read as follows:

Resolved, That the special rule of the Senate No. 34 be amended by adding thereto these words:

A committee for the investigation of the transactions of the Government in all its departments and offices, to consist of five members, which committee shall be appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate. Whenever there is a party political opposition to the executive administration of the Government in the Senate, the chairman and a majority of the committee shall be selected from the Senators in such opposition. And said committee shall have power to continue its investigations during the recess of the Senate, and to send for persons and papers, and to adjourn from time to time and day to day.

Mr. HALE. My honorable friend from Kentucky wants to have a committee of frauds generally, a standing committee. I am opposed to it, as I stated before, and I stated one of the reasons why I was opposed to it. It was that I thought a few of the frauds which had been discovered and brought to light ought to be dealt with before we went hunting for any more. I hold in my hand a report made to the House of Representatives a few years ago by a very distinguished gentleman, then a member of the House, John Sherman, of Ohio. I do not violate any rule, sir, in mentioning his name, because I am not speaking of a member of the Senate, but of a man who was a member of the House of Representatives some years ago. [Laughter.] That gentleman discharged his duties upon that committee with great fidelity, and submitted, as the result of his investigation, certain resolutions to the House which I will read. It should be remembered that that House in 1859 was about evenly divided; it was difficult to say what party had a majority; it was not more than one or two either way; but the House, by a very decided vote, passed these resolutions, a vote of nearly two thirds. I will read them:

"In conclusion, the undersigned recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy,"—

That was not this Secretary of the Navy; it was another Connecticut man—

"with the sanction of the President,"—

I believe that President was Mr. Buchanan—

"abused his discretionary power in the selection of a coal agent and in the purchase of fuel for the Government.

"Resolved, That the contract made by the Secretary of the Navy, under date of September 23, 1858, with Mr. W. C. N. Swift, for the delivery of live-oak timber, was made in violation of law, and in a manner unusual, improper, and injurious to the public service.

"Resolved, That the distribution by the Secretary of the Navy of the patronage in the navy-yards among members of Congress was destructive of discipline, corrupting in its influence, and highly injurious to the public service.

"Resolved, That the President and the Secretary of the Navy, by receiving and considering the party relations of bidders for contracts with the United States, and the effect of awarding contracts upon pending elections, have set an example dangerous to the public safety, and deserving the reproof of this House.

"Resolved, That the appointment by the Secretary of the Navy of Daniel B. Martin, chief engineer, as a member of a board of engineers to report upon proposals for constructing machinery for the United States (the said Martin at the time being peculiarly interested in some of said proposals) is hereby censured by this House."

Those resolutions were passed in the House of Representatives, as I said, by a majority of two thirds, some of them falling a fraction short of two thirds, and some of them going over that. One of the contracts that was thus censured was of a very gross, outrageous character, to wit, the contract for live oak made by John Lenthall; and the excuse that Mr. Lenthall, on oath, gave for this violation of duty for which the House censured the Secretary, was that he was commanded to do it by the Secretary; and he had the advantage of that excuse. When the Senate committee of last session sat, they did not censure the Secretary, but they took the individual men who had committed the frauds and put their hands upon them. It seems, however, that it cannot be done either way; the right person cannot be hit. Lenthall excused himself under oath in his examination in 1859 by saying that he was ordered by the Secretary to do what he did, and he did it; and in the language of the House of Representatives, "the contract made by the Secretary of the Navy, under date of September 23, 1858, with Mr. W. C. N. Swift, for the delivery of live-oak timber, was made in violation of law and in a manner unusual, improper, and injurious to the public service." How was Lenthall ever dealt with for that gross violation of law? I will tell you. The first opportunity that presented he was promoted and made chief of the Bureau of Construction. The odium that was thrown upon his official character by this report, and by the action of the House of Representatives upon it, was such that he was not confirmed at the first session that his name was sent in, and the nomination was laid over; but still it was insisted upon, and he was renominated as chief of this new bureau that was created, and the nomination was finally confirmed by the Senate. The perpetrator of that fraud, thus exposed through the vigilance and faithfulness of the committee of the House of Representatives, and brought to light, instead of being punished, was rewarded, and promoted, and put into a place where he might do, and as I contend has done, the same thing over again substantially.

Mr. DAVIS. By what Secretary was he promoted?

Mr. HALE. The official records of the Government will show it. While that is the case, while this volume of I do not know how many pages, showing the gross frauds of the Navy Department, which were censured by a vote of two thirds in the House of Representatives, has had no effect on earth except to promote those guilty of the frauds which were censured, in Heaven's name, what does the Senator from Kentucky want of any more committees? I tell you, sir, that if ever I vote for a committee on frauds in the Navy Department, they shall be instructed to cover them up, instead of exposing them; because if we expose them and do not punish the perpetrators, we only disgrace the nation. If we do not mean to punish, let us cover them up, and let us have a committee whose duty it shall be to whitewash and cover up these frauds and defalcations.

I mention that circumstance to show the folly of having any more committees of investigation to hunt after frauds. Now, sir, I am going to give you some more. When the committee of the Senate examined some of the bids in the several bureaus—for Lenthall is not alone; there is no one bureau that we examined which can claim any exemption over another—they took up a very extraordinary bid made in the Bureau of Yards and Docks. I will read what it was:

"The attention of the committee was also called to a bid in the Bureau of Yards and Docks, which is of so extraordinary a character that it seems to demand a passing notice. This is for class seven, ship-chandlery, at the New York navy-yard. It was awarded to a Mr. Bingham, at $17,778 23. C. W. Scofield was a bidder at $13,053 90. The original footing of Scofield's bid was $12,053 90: an error of $1,000 was discovered in the bureau after the bid was handed in, so that it should have footed $13,053 90, after the correction of this error. Without the correction of this error this bid would have been $5,724 33 below the next bid, Mr. Bingham's. Such being the state of these two bids as they were originally made, Mr. Scofield's bid is raised by the sum of $5,000 in one single article, and your committee do not find there was any other alteration made. This alteration of Scofield's bid, by which the aggregate was so largely increased, was effected by putting a unit to the left of the figures 65, which was the sum bid for hickory butts each, and there being five thousand of them wanted, the addition of a dollar apiece for them would make the amount of $5,000, and Scofield's bid would still have been the lowest, and he would have got the contract after this amount was thus added, had not an error been discovered in his original computation, which, being subsequently corrected, and the $5,000 being added, made his bid higher than Mr. Bingham's, and he thus failed of realizing anything by this fraud."

Rear Admiral Smith, the head of that bureau, had his attention called to these bids, and was asked if there was any fraud in them, and he replied generally, as the rest of them did, that there was none. I will read what he said:

"Mr. Smith, chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, makes no general declaration of the kind made by Mr. Lenthall and Mr. Isherwood, but confines himself, while speaking of an erroneous computation discovered by Mr. Smith and brought to public notice in his pamphlet, to the assertion that he 'is confident that no collusion or erroneous exhibit was intended by the clerks. I have the utmost confidence in the honesty and fidelity of those gentlemen.'"

This was so gross, so glaring—a 1 inserted on the left hand of 65 in that bid for five thousand articles, so that the bid was raised $5,000 in amount by this single alteration—that I addressed a note to Mr. Smith, not willing to let him stand on the record as this paper put him, and called his attention to this particular case, and he wrote to the committee as follows:

"I have examined the testimony of Mr. Bronaugh, and the original bids for class T—ship-chandlery for ordnance department at the New York navy-yard. It is evident to me that the original price charged in Scofield's bid for the hickory butts was sixty-five cents, and the aggregate was carried out accordingly; that the figure 1 in the column of dollars was added subsequently, but the aggregate was not altered. It is also evident to me that the alteration in price, the aggregate of the class as written in words, and Scofield's signature, were all written by the same hand and with the same ink, and I am perfectly satisfied that this was all done before the bid came to this office."

Of course he was satisfied. Before his attention was called to it he was satisfied that there was no alteration at all; he had perfect confidence in his clerks. When his attention is called to it, and this enormous and glaring fraud is pointed out, by which $5,000 might have been taken out of the Treasury in a single article, he then admits that it is so, that it was fraudulently done, but still it does not shake his confidence in his clerks! Now, sir, it is worth while to look at this. This alteration, as I contend and as the committee believed, was made after Scofield knew the state of the bids. Remember, this bid then stood with an erroneous footing by which it was $1,000 less than it ought to have been; but after he saw the next highest bid he could raise his bid $5,000 and still be the lowest bidder. The alteration was made, and then the error of the erroneous computation to the extent of $1,000 was discovered, and by the discovery of that mistake this fraud was prevented from being successful.

If Senators had read this report, if the keen appetite of the Senator from Kentucky had permitted him to give half an hour before breakfast to reading the report, he would have found that the history of these bureaus was full, full to overflowing, of just exactly such cases; and that where ever there was but one bidder, his bid was increased before the opening to the extent of one or two hundred per cent., and exactly in the same way that this was done. Let me call attention to one case of that kind particularly, because I do not speak without the book upon this matter:

"This bid, which was rejected under advertisement of February 13, 1863, was class thirty-three, for hardware for Brooklyn yard, and was at least one hundred per cent. above the market price.

"This bid came to the bureau, as is alleged, with an aggregate footing of the prices of $15,797, the correct footing of which was $22,585 40."

That is a very successful dodge of fraudulent contractors, because they think the bureau will just look at the footings; so they make an erroneous footing.

"This was the bid of Joseph L. Savage, and he was the only bidder for this class at the Brooklyn yard at this letting. As this bid is one characteristic of a large class, your committee propose to call attention to some things about it which to them, to say the least, appear exceedingly strange and unaccountable by any theory consistent with the integrity of those acting for the Government in this matter.

"The aggregate of this bid as originally made out and written down at length, was $6,725 40. That was the state of that bid when it was completed, and by subsequent alterations and erasures and additions it was increased to $22,585 40, thus, by this means, increasing the aggregate of the bid more than two hundred per cent. The chief clerk of the bureau, who appeared before the committee and was examined by them, swears that the bid as it now is is just as it was when it was opened. This evidence should be weighed and considered along with the other evidence in the case in determining how the fact is. In the first place, the clerk does not appear to have, nor does he mean that he has, any particular recollection of the precise facts of this identical bid, but swears from a general belief that such was or should have been the fact in all cases. Against this statement there is presented this question, arising on the face of the paper, namely: Does it appear credible or even possible that the honest correction of mistakes or erroneous estimates of prices by a merchant in a bid deliberately made should carry prices from $6,725 40, to $22,585 40—more than two hundred per cent.?

"This question appears the more significant when we look at the mode by which this result has been reached.

"In one article of brass screws, of which there were to be purchased 1,000 gross, originally bid for at $3 a gross, and carried out correctly, $3,000, the 3 was subsequently altered to 9, making the amount $9,000, instead of $3,000, as it originally was, and by this single operation raising the price $6,000.

"Another item of 75 yards iron jack-chain, originally bid for at 41 cents, and carried out correctly $30 75, has a figure 1 inserted before 41, thus making the bid 141, instead of 41, and making another item by which the bid is increased $75. It appears strange to your committee that the honest correction of a mistake should require the addition of a dollar to a bid which must be supposed to have been underratingly made at 41 cents originally.

"Another correction of this kind is found of 50 dozen scutechons, thread brass, assorted, originally bid for at 30 cents, subsequently changed to $1 30, the original carrying out of the price being $15, which is correct, and the addition of $1 making an increase of the price to the amount of $50, and the aggregate $65 instead of $15. These alterations appear to have been made with different ink from that originally used in making the bid.

"Another correction of a similar character is where 100 pairs brass butt hinges, originally bid for at 75 cents a pair, had a figure 1 subsequently inserted before the 75, making the bid $1 75 a pair instead of 75 cents a pair, as originally bid.

"Another instance of the similar correction of a mistake in this extraordinary bid is where 400 pairs of brass butt hinges, originally bid for at 30 cents a pair, and carried out in the aggregate correctly at $120, has by the same process had a figure 1 inserted before the 30, making the bid $1 30 a pair, instead of 30 cents, as it originally was, and the aggregate $520; making a difference against the Government in this article alone of $400.

"Your committee forbear to pursue this particular branch of inquiry in regard to this bid any further, satisfied that from the cases referred to enough is shown to enable any one disposed to pursue the inquiry honestly, and to give to established and unquestionable facts their just consideration, to come to a fair solution of any question which the facts raise.

"In the first place, were these alterations, thus exhibited, honestly made, and the fair correction of errors in prices at first inadvertently made, and upon subsequent reflection honestly corrected? To that question, in the minds of your committee, there is and can be but one answer, and that a decided negative."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. HALE. I bow to that, of course; but I would suggest that it is rather inconvenient to be making these speeches at such little short hitches, and I would be glad if the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] should be complied with, and that if we intend to look this up, (for I am interested about this committee question,) we assign some day for its consideration.

Mr. WILSON. Say the day after to-morrow.
Mr. HALE. I move that the resolution be postponed until the day after to-morrow, (Thursday,) and made the special order for one o'clock of that day.

The motion was agreed to by a two-thirds vote.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order assigned for this day is a bill (S. No. 359) to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States; but that is superseded by the unfinished business of yesterday (S. R. No. 97) advising retaliation for the cruel treatment of prisoners by the insurgents.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to state to the Senate that the bill which was made the special order for to-day is a bill of very great importance to my State, and unless it is passed promptly in this body, I fear that there will not be sufficient time left to secure for it the consideration of the House of Representatives, and I desire very much to have it passed by Congress at this session. It has been postponed to enable Senators to examine the report made in the case by the Military Committee, unanimously, as I understand. I desire that it shall be taken up to-day, and not lose its place. I therefore move that all prior orders be postponed, and that the bill be now considered. I think it will take but a few moments.

The motion was agreed to; and the Secretary commenced to read the bill.

Mr. WADE. Before that is read, I move to proceed to the order of the day; I see no reason for superseding that order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order of the day is before the Senate.

Mr. WADE. I know it is before the Senate, but I move to supersede it by taking up the unfinished business of yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The measure to which the Senator from Ohio refers was before the Senate a few moments since, and the Senate has just postponed it.

Mr. WADE. That is so; but I suppose it is in order at this time to move to lay this bill aside and take up that. I was deceived in what was up, or I should have resisted that motion. I was told that what was proposed was what I wanted, or I should certainly have opposed it, for I would not consent to quit the regular order and take up other business at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves to postpone the pending order for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 97.

Mr. HENDERSON. I sincerely hope the Senator from Ohio will not insist upon that motion. This bill was called up some ten days ago, and was postponed to and made the special order for to-day. It was supposed then that this would be the last day we could possibly have, in order to allow time for the proper consideration of the bills in the House of Representatives. It is a bill of very deep importance to my State. I do not desire to antagonize it with the measure of which the Senator from Ohio has charge; but it was made the special order for to-day at one o'clock, and I want action on it. I do not ask to have it taken up so as to get rid of the Senator's resolution, but so that it may be disposed of at once. There is a lengthy report accompanying the bill, a full report of all the circumstances attending this claim on the part of the State, and Senators have no doubt thoroughly examined it. I hope the Senator from Ohio will postpone for a little while his desire to have his resolution considered this morning, and let me have this bill disposed of. If it provokes any discussion, I shall be willing to let it be postponed and made the special order for to-morrow, or the next day, or some other very early day. I do not desire to conflict with the consideration of the question that he is now urging; but in view of the very great importance of this bill to my State and the possibility of the results which may follow its defeat, I must beg the Senate to indulge me by early disposing of the bill.

Probably Senators will remember that at the close of the last session I undertook to get a bill of this character passed, and then stated to the Senate that unless it was done our State would be overrun by Price and his men. Since then that very thing has occurred. I desire now to state to the Senate that, in my opinion, unless something of this sort is done, we shall be subjected to the very same treatment that we have been subjected to there for the last three or four years. By failing to act here last year, the people of Missouri lost twenty millions of property in consequence of that raid of Price.

It is a matter of very great importance to my State. Financially it is overthrown, and without something to sustain and uphold the finances of the State, we have no ability to oppose ourselves to these frequent inroads. We have to-day fifty-nine thousand men down in the army of the Tennessee. They have been doing duty there. Our men are sent out of the State just so soon as they enter the service, and we are left to defend ourselves by our enrolled militia. The military commanders of the United States, being also major generals of the enrolled militia, have called it out year after year, and the State of Missouri has been compelled to pay them; if the State does not pay, nobody pays. The Senate will remember the condition of my State; it is not in a condition to meet these demands upon its treasury. I sincerely hope, inasmuch as this bill was ten days ago made the special order for to-day, that the Senate will agree to have it now considered.

Mr. WADE. I will not consent that the regular order of the day shall be superseded by any pecuniary interest whatever. In my judgment it is a measure that ought not to be delayed an hour; and when the gentleman seeks to antagonize with it a bill which he says is of deep pecuniary interest to his State, involving a large sum of money, I suppose, I know enough of the Senate to know that it will be debated perhaps for a long time; and I cannot consent to allow this great measure, which the Senate have had so long under consideration, to be superseded by any other measure that Senators can get up. Of course, if the Senate see fit to pass it by, they will do so, but never with my consent. I hope the Senate will proceed with the regular order of the day, and finish it to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WADE called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand the proposition is to postpone the consideration of the bill that the Senator from Missouri has called up, in order to go on with the resolution of the Senator from Ohio.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the question.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now I desire merely to state to the Senate, before the vote is taken, that this bill was ten days ago made the special order for to-day at one o'clock.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ANTHONY responded to his name.

Mr. HENDERSON. Senators seem not to understand the question—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is not open to debate, the call of the roll having commenced and one Senator having answered to his name.

Mr. HENDERSON. Senators seem not to understand the question, and I desire at least to have it stated again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the question again, if there be no objection. Senate joint resolution No. 97, relating to retaliation, was before the Senate as the unfinished business of yesterday. The Senator from Missouri moved to postpone that for the purpose of taking up the bill which was made the special order for to-day. That motion was put and declared to be agreed to. The Secretary was proceeding to read that bill, when the Senator from Ohio moved to postpone it for the purpose of taking up the unfinished business of yesterday; and that is the question now before the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. The question is on postponing the Missouri bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes, for the purpose of taking up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. GRIMES] has been detained for several days from his seat on account of sickness, and is still detained for the same reason.

The calling of the roll having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 20, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Hartan, Howart, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Ramsey, Teas Eyck, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Davis, Hale, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Salsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wright—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Grimes, Harding, Harris, Hicks, McDougall, Pomeroy, Riddle, Sherman, and Trumbull—11.

So the motion was agreed to.

RETALIATION ON REBEL PRISONERS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, accordingly resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 97) advising retaliation for the cruel treatment of prisoners by the insurgents.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to recommit the resolution with all the amendments and proposed amendments to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WADE. That was withdrawn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Upon that question the yeas and nays were ordered, and it could not be withdrawn without unanimous consent, which was refused.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I did not expect to say another word upon this subject, and would not now except for some of the arguments made yesterday by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER], and more particularly because of an editorial which I find in the Republican organ of the State of Indiana, which I received this morning, and parts of which I will read:

"In a recent discussion in the United States Senate on the subject of retaliation upon the rebels for their inhuman treatment of our prisoners of war, the telegraph reports Mr. Hendricks as having said 'that he was in favor of no retaliation.' That was not a principle of Christianity. He stated upon the authority of Captain Flinn, a released prisoner from Indiana, that the prisoners at Andersonville were treated as well as the rebel guards." On being questioned by Mr. HOWARD in reference to his position, Mr. HENDRICKS replied 'that he did not know only what he had stated upon the authority of a returned prisoner.'

"Captain Flinn, the prisoner to whom Senator H. refers, being incidentally on a visit to our city, has called at our office and given a denial to the statements of Mr. Hendricks, so far as he (Flinn) is concerned. The captain says that he never talked with the honorable Senator on this subject. Furthermore, that he never was in Andersonville, and so knows nothing experimentally, or by observation, of the treatment of our prisoners there. He is diametrically opposed to the views of Mr. Hendricks in this matter, and he has good reason to be.

"It will be recalled by most of our readers that in July, 1863, Captain Flinn, in connection with Captain Sawyer, was chosen by lot from the officers confined in Libby prison to be hung in retaliation for two spies who were executed by General Burnside. They were thrown into a dungeon, and there, for six weeks, experienced untold barbarities at the hands of the rebels. Their release was only secured by the positive and expressed determination of the Federal Government to execute Fitz Hugh Lee and General Winder's son in case Flinn and Sawyer should be shot or hung."

I do not know that I have a right to find fault with an editor who ventures to base a criticism upon any information he gets from Congress by the telegraphic dispatches, especially those coming through the Associated Press, they are so unreliable when they reach the distant portions of the country; but perhaps it is due to myself, as this is published in my State and will be generally circulated, that I should correct almost every statement made in the article.

In the first place, the dispatch, according to the editor's article, seems to make me say that I am opposed to retaliation in any case. Senators who did me the honor to listen to what I submitted the other day know very well that I took the very opposite ground; and, that I may not be misunderstood now upon the subject, I will read what I said upon it. During the course of my remarks, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] asked this question:

"I ask the Senator whether he is in favor of any retaliation with a view to compel the rebels to treat our prisoners with more kindness and humanity."

To which I made this reply:

"I am in favor of carrying on this war upon our part as a civilized and Christian people. I am in favor of compelling the southern people to carry on the war upon their part as a Christian and civilized people; and if they refuse to do it, I am in favor of retaliating for the protection of our people and soldiers just so far as the usages of civilized nations will justify, and just so far, as a civilized and Christian people, we ought to go, and no further."

It is very difficult to understand how the author of this telegraphic dispatch could have reported me as having said that I was opposed to any retaliation. I read from a very distinguished author of our own country to show that retaliation was right, but also to show the limitation that the laws and usages of nations impose upon the right of retaliation, and held, as I have just read, that we were restrained by the usages of civilized and Christian nations. For two or three days I have had upon my table an amendment, which at the proper time I intended to propose, which expressed my view upon this whole subject, and which I will read as a part of my remarks:

Be it resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That, in the judgment of Congress, such proper measures ought to be taken by the President of the United States as may be necessary to obtain the earliest exchange of prisoners at all times during the continuance of the war.

And be it further resolved, That the executive and military authorities of the United States are hereby directed to treat prisoners of the enemy in such manner, in accordance with the usages of civilized nations, as shall be effective in deterring the enemy from the perpetration in future of cruel and barbarous treatment of our soldiers held as prisoners of war.

These two resolutions present my views upon this whole subject: first, that, as a remedy for the evils of which we complain, we demand of the Administration the adoption of all proper measures which will secure an early and immediate exchange of prisoners during the continuance of the war. This is a remedy which I can appreciate, and, in my judgment, is a remedy which the country will appreciate. As I had an opportunity the other day to give the Senate the reasons why I was in favor of the remedy by exchange, I need not now repeat them. They were in substance these: that if we leave our soldiers in southern prisons, in an unhealthy climate, exposed, as of necessity they must be, to hardships, they will encounter diseases, and that to restore them to health we desire to bring them to their homes, that they may enjoy the advantages which home alone can give.

But, sir, I do not care to continue the discussion upon that particular point further. If it is the judgment of the Senate that a policy ought not to be adopted which will secure an exchange of prisoners, I must be content; but I hope that before this subject passes from the consideration of the Senate a very decided expression will be given in favor of the adoption of such measures as will secure an immediate exchange of prisoners during the continuance of the war.

The other resolution which I propose to submit as a substitute for the proposition now before the Senate is restricted as I understand the laws of nations require us to restrict it. That we have a right to retaliate is not to be questioned; but to what extent, to what point? As far as the usages of civilized nations allow us to go. Is this Senate prepared to go further? The Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN], in a very able argument the other day showed that Congress could not modify or amend the laws of nations. We can enact a municipal law which will have force upon our own citizens, which will have force upon our own soldiers; but so far as we as a nation, a member of the family of civilized nations, are concerned, we cannot modify the laws of nations. That system of laws has been adopted by the usage of nations; it is the common law of nations, and can only be modified by a contrary usage of nations.

I desire also to correct the statement of this editor in respect to Captain Flinn, for whom, as I said the other day, I have a personal regard and friendship. Captain Flinn, the editor says, does not agree with the statement which I made to the Senate; and what statement does Captain Flinn not agree to? I was represented as saying that he had reported to his neighbors that at Andersonville there were no cruelties perpetrated upon our prisoners. The Senate very well know that I made no such statement; and it is very reasonable that Captain Flinn should be surprised to see by the telegraphic dispatch that I had made such a statement. Captain Flinn, I believe, was never at Andersonville. He was a prisoner at Libby; and what I said in respect to Captain Flinn was in reply to the evidence the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] adduced in respect to the treatment of prisoners in Libby, and was expressly so restricted.

The editor goes on further to say that Captain Flinn says he had no conversation with me on the subject. I believe that is true. I do not recollect to have met Captain Flinn but once, and I think that was upon the streets of Indianapolis, but for a few minutes since his release from Libby. I did not profess in the course of the debate to speak upon my own knowledge of what Captain Flinn had said. I had then no doubt, and I have now no doubt, that what I said was correct. I will read from what I said, showing that I spoke from information:

"I have given the statement of an honest man who was a prisoner there for months, a part of the time in a dungeon, selected by lot to be shot. When he came home he made this statement to his neighbors. I have no doubt that there have been cruelties inflicted on the Union prisoners in southern prisons; and that is one reason why I want them brought home; but I do not believe that it has gone to the extent reported in the country."

I stated to the Senate what I knew was what he had stated to his neighbors; but further in the debate I made it more explicit that my information was derived from his neighbors. In the course of the argument made by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FOSTER], I corrected a misunderstanding on the part of that Senator, and repeated what I had said on this subject, and continued:

"This I was informed by his neighbors with whom he conversed immediately on his return. Of course, that is confined to Libby prison. I suppose Captain Flinn knew nothing about any other."

I undertook to state to the Senate what Captain Flinn had said to his neighbors, as they informed me. Nor does Captain Flinn undertake to correct that statement; but he undertakes to correct the statement that he had been at Andersonville and that there were no cruelties perpetrated at Andersonville; a thing that I never thought of. He was not there, and of course could know nothing about the treatment of prisoners at Andersonville. I concede that if he saw what was reported in the telegraphic dispatch, he would be surprised that I should have said that he had reported that there were no cruelties at Andersonville.

Again, the editor undertakes, as I think, to make the impression that Captain Flinn was not released through any efforts which I made in his behalf. I am not going to discuss that question. Captain Flinn's letter was received by me, and that very same morning I took it to the President of the United States, and he was kind enough to make the proper indorsement upon the letter; and I presume that that letter, with the President's indorsement, is now in the proper office in the War Department to speak for itself. Captain Flinn knows by whose efforts he obtained his discharge from prison.

I believe, sir, this is all the explanation I desire to make in respect to this editorial.

I have now but a very few remarks to make in continuation of this debate. I am in favor of the recommitment of this whole subject to the Committee on Military Affairs. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] said yesterday that any Senator who voted for the reference was necessarily in favor of the postponement and final defeat of the measure. I say that the Senator according to the usages of the body is not justified in making that statement. Is not this business in a proper condition to be sent back to the committee? When the memorial on this subject was presented by my colleague some time ago, and when a resolution was presented by the Senator from Ohio some days since, both were referred to the committee; and why? That that committee might digest a proposition which would probably meet with the approval of the Senate. When the resolution came back, it appeared early in the debate that no side of the Chamber would sustain the proposition as it came from the committee. The debate has gone on from day to day; numerous amendments have been presented; and I now claim that the committee, if this subject be sent back to them, with the light of this debate and of the amendments proposed, can return to the body a proposition which will meet the approval of a large majority of the Senate. Then I say it is proper, it is according to the usages of the Senate, and it will facilitate the business of the body.

But, sir, the Senator from Ohio has no right as an equal in this body to tell us that by adopting the course that we think is right we are opposed to a just measure. We who are in favor of this reference desire to have the measure considered by a committee and properly presented to the body, in order that a large vote may be received in the Senate. That can be done; we have a right to it; and it is not for the Senator to threaten Senators with the displeasure of the country if they do not agree with him. He has the benefit of incorporating in this resolution the very words that he desires to be used. Other Senators desire that their propositions shall go before a committee and shall be properly considered. As the measure now stands, we are cut off from amendment. The Senator, no doubt, is content with the amendment which he has now before the body. He has the advantage of incorporating in this resolution just such words as he desires to use; and if any other Senator prefers other language, and desires that to go to the committee for their consideration, the Senator ought to treat with indulgence this fair desire on our part. I hope the whole subject will be referred; it is according to the usages of the body, and I think will secure the early consideration of a measure with which we shall all be content.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] yesterday used language that I thought remarkable in this body; but as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] has replied in part, it is not necessary for me to refer to their arguments at any length. The Senator from Ohio said:

"If a man has no sympathy for these barbarians, why are his nerves more affected by the proposition to subject them to the same treatment that they inflict upon us? Why is it that gentlemen's sympathies are all that way? You know from the evidence that these outrages are committed; you cannot deny it. The Senator from Illinois does not deny it. He is too candid to do so. He says there is no doubt about the fact. We all know that our soldiers to-day are subjected to all that barbarity can inflict upon them. We know that this day in southern prisons there are thousands of our brave soldiers dying by inches by reason of the barbarity of their captors and keepers."

Again, the Senator says:

"Sir, sympathy for the rebellion cannot stop it. Fellowship with the leaders, old acquaintance with them, high standing with them, raising them up as the idols of your idolatry, cannot save them."

It is difficult to tell to whom the Senator referred. The most earnest denunciation of the measure was from the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] I had not known that the Senator from Massachusetts had ever very intimate fellowship with the leaders of the rebellion. I had not known that he was in high standing with the leaders of the rebellion. I think that anything but very intimate relations existed between that Senator and the leaders of the rebellion; and I cannot conceive why the Senator from Ohio should attribute to the Senator from Massachusetts relations of that sort or sympathy with the rebellion. Does he refer to other Senators? In the course of this debate there has been nothing said which justifies the charge of sympathy with the rebellion. So far as I am concerned I disclaim all sympathy with the rebels. Politically, I have more cause of complaint against the leaders of the rebellion than the Senator. They never were his friends politically. Many of them once belonged to the Democratic party, and in my judgment they were in honor bound to stand by the doctrines of that party as enunciated in the Cincinnati convention in 1856; and when they abandoned the Union they abandoned their obligations to the party to which I belong; they cut themselves off from the sympathy to which they were entitled while they stood faithfully to the Union and the Constitution.

Mr. WADE. If the Senator will allow me, I think he is mistaken in one thing. He says that the leaders of the rebellion belonged to the Democratic party. I think the Democratic party belonged to them. I think he is wrong in that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not intend in the course of this debate to bandy words. I am answering the insinuations of the Senator. I should have liked it better if he had made a direct charge against some Senator that he held sympathy with the rebellion, rather than by insinuation to make the charge. The Senator spoke earnestly yesterday of courage. I think, sir, it is evidence of courage where a man makes a charge squarely and directly, rather than by insinuation. So far as I am concerned, I throw the insinuation back to the Senator from Ohio. I have never done an act, I have never said a word, that evidenced a sympathy with the rebellion. This far I have gone; this far I go now: I hope to see the day when they will be back among us, friends again, obedient to the law, honoring and respecting the Constitution and the flag of my country, so that we shall once more be the united, prosperous, and happy people that we were before these difficulties came upon us. Is that sympathy with the rebellion? That, sir, in my judgment, is sympathy with my country, my whole country.

This is not the first time in the history of legislation that fear has been held up to control the action of legislators. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] makes threats of our constituency, particularly "the constituency of the Senators from Massachusetts. Is the Senator not aware that the language of threat can only be answered by that of defiance? Who constituted the Senator from Michigan a pedagogue in our body to hold the ferule over shivering children? I expect to vote according to the dictates of my judgment and conscience, and intimations of "sympathy with the rebellion" will not control me. My conscience being right on this subject, I shall vote according to that conscience. As I referred to the French Revolution the other day by way of illustration, I will refer to it again, and will read one passage from Abbott's French Revolution. Speaking of the horrible butcheries daily perpetrated in Paris, the author says:

"And yet there was a cowardly spirit impelling these massacres. No one dared speak a word in behalf of mercy lest he should be deemed in sympathy with aristocrats. He alone was safe from suspicion who was merciless in denunciation of the suspected. It is, however, remarkable that nearly all the actors in these scenes of blood, even in the hour of death, protested their conscientiousness and their integrity."

In the midst of those horrible scenes the most extreme men excited suspicion against those who were in favor of a wiser and a more humane policy. I have here a list of the executions during those horrible times, but I will not detain the Senate by reading it. But, sir, he in Paris in those days who was not in favor of wholesale butchery was a suspected person; and why? Because the leaders chose to use that suspicion as a power to control the votes of members of the Convention. Why, sir, did you ever observe the charge upon which

Danton was tried and executed? When the massacres had gone to such an extent as to shock even Danton, he was put upon his trial, and this is the charge:

"A secret meeting of the Committee of Public Safety was convened by night, and Danton was accused of the 'treason of clemency.'" "As Danton entered the gloomy portals of the prison he said, 'At length I perceive that, in revolution, the supreme power ultimately rests with the most abandoned.'"

I have said, Mr. President, that I am in favor of that policy which will secure the return of our brothers and friends now in southern prisons to their homes. I have said that I am in favor of such retaliation as will secure to them treatment according to the usages of civilized nations. Does any Senator object to that proposition? This is clemency, they say, and this justifies Senators in intimating that there is a sympathy with the rebellion. My sympathy is not with the rebellion, but with my country. I say we cannot do what is proposed and stand as a civilized people among the nations of the earth. I wish I could command at the present moment the language of one of the greatest orators of our country. The sentiment he expressed I can give. He was speaking of the conduct of Russia toward the exiles from Hungary. He said the earthquake has its power, the lightning has its power, the tornado has its power, but there is a power greater than all, and that is the judgment of the civilized world. When the Senator from Ohio speaks of courage, I claim to have the courage which I accord to him; but I say, as a Senator representing one of the proud States of this Union, I do defer to the judgment of the civilized world.

What record does the Senator propose that we shall make? The South say that they have treated our prisoners as well as they could. It is not believed here; it is not believed by myself; but that is their defense; that is what they say to the nations of the world. "We have treated these prisoners as well as our means would allow; we have not wantonly and willfully inflicted cruelty and barbarity upon them." That is the message they send out to the world. What message do we send? We say to the nations of the world, in the language of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER:]

"I shall vote for this measure of retaliation, and for any measure of retaliation that promises to be effective. Ay, sir, I will carry it to the point of starvation. A Senator the other day put the question, would you carry it to the stake? Yes, sir, I will carry it to the stake, and I will carry it to any extent that is necessary to preserve the lives of those suffering and helpless prisoners now dying by thousands in the hands of these accursed, hellish rebels."

Nobody can charge the Senator with any sympathy for rebels after the use of such powerful language. If thoughts become powerful as the language is very strong, the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Michigan certainly command most potent arguments. "Hellish rebels!" As I said, I hope to see the day when they will be American citizens again, obedient to the laws and the Constitution, and when that time comes, I think the Senator from Michigan will look back to this little record of his with some regret. When we come to be one people again, as he and I alike hope for, when the social relations are restored, when we visit them and they visit us, when the railroads shall be reconstructed that bind us to them, when our trade shall be renewed, and the men of his State and of my State shall again carry the products of our rich lands down the rivers to sell to them, and buy from them and bring back the means of increasing prosperity to our respective States, then the Senator will wish he had used such terms in this debate that all could look back to it without a regret.

Mr. President, I cannot support the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, though it is hard to tell what his proposition is. He argued yesterday for starvation; but his resolution is not for starvation. He has yielded that. His proposition before the body upon retaliation, conceding the power to the President, directs him to exercise that power only according to the laws and usages of nations. Then if he wished this debate to come to a close and that we should have a vote on the measure, why was it necessary to go back and discuss a proposition which he had himself abandoned? My objection to it is this: after he had abandoned his original resolution by his modification, he then makes this speech with the expectation, I suppose, that the President will read the resolution in the light of the speech. I do not consent to that. His proposition of starvation, and the proposition of the Senator from Michigan, of the stake, I think would find but little support in this body. I do not go for it, and we cannot go for it. Senators say it shall be, but I say it will not be. It cannot be, for God and His religion forbid it; it cannot be, for civilized humanity forbid it; it cannot be, for the genius of our country presiding over its destiny forbids it. Let the resolution, then, be modified by the committee so as to reflect the sentiments of the body as shown in the debate, and the many amendments that have been offered, and there will be no difficulty in passing the measure.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. President, I listened the other day to the statement of the Senator from Indiana as he understood it to have been made by Captain Flinn to his neighbors at home in relation to the manner in which our prisoners had been treated in Libby prison, or at Richmond. That statement did not exactly accord with the statement I myself had received from an authoritative source; but I did not feel myself called upon to arrest the Senator in the progress of the debate for the purpose of making a counter statement, nor did I consider it necessary at that time to interfere with the discussion for the purpose of counteracting the influence of that statement, supposing it was not materially to be relied upon, or that a point would not be made of it in relation to the mode in which our prisoners were treated at Richmond. But since that matter has been referred to over and over again, and reiterated during the course of this discussion some three or four times, I think it is my duty, in justice to the true history of the mode of treating prisoners there, and in justice to a gallant Union soldier and sufferer, that I should make a simple statement of the evidence in my possession.

Captain Henry Sawyer, who was taken at the same time with Captain Flinn, and who was held by the rebels for retaliation on account of two of their officers who had been executed under General Burnside's command, came to the city of Washington the very day after he landed at Annapolis, fresh from the Libby prison. He was from my State; and I am proud of the man who has by his gallantry, although acting in an inferior capacity, shed luster and honor upon her soldiery. Captain Sawyer came tottering into my house in the presence of my wife and children, and he detailed the sufferings of our Union soldiers in the Libby prison. He stated, if I remember his declarations aright, and they made a deep impression upon me at the time, that they suffered almost everything but death. He stated that they were nearly starved; that they had not sufficient clothing and protection from the weather; and so far as regarded himself and Captain Flinn, they were cast into a dungeon, and one had to sit up and watch while the other slept to prevent them from being gnawed by the rats. The story made such an impression upon me that I have thought of it since in my dreams. Whether the report made by Captain Flinn's neighbors of the treatment of prisoners in Libby is correct, or whether the report made by my friend Captain Sawyer is correct, I am unable to say; but the effect of that treatment upon Captain Sawyer was such that as soon as he was able to resume the saddle he went, in accordance with the indignation of his feelings, declaring in the presence of my family that he would retaliate upon these rebels with his saber; and he has done it since to our credit and to his credit.

I make this statement in justice to him, and for the purpose of putting his testimony before the country in relation to the mode in which our Union prisoners are treated at Richmond as well as at Andersonville.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for but a moment or two only upon this question. It has been discussed so fully and freely and frankly that I feel in reference to my position upon the question very much as a patriotic lady from Philadelphia felt yesterday. After listening to the debate on this subject for a day or two she said, "My grandson shall be a Senator of the United States." You can imagine the mother's feeling in reference to a relation so intimate as that of grandchild; and, sir, if it is in my power to be of any service on this floor in my capacity as a Senator, I shall yet be inspired with a feeling to do and to dare for that country whenever her service may seem to require it.

It may not be improper for me to state something in relation to the early progress of this question in committee and out of committee. It was my privilege early in this war to know something of the barbarities of the enemy toward our soldiers. It has since been my privilege to know something of the progress of this question of retaliation in committee and out of committee. It was early agitated there. One of its distinguished members was called upon to make a report upon the subject long before it was agitated in the Senate. When he was about ready to make that report, the subject was agitated in the Senate by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] who suggested a course of action upon it, and their propositions were referred to that committee. The Senator from Ohio has informed you that when this resolution was first presented to the Senate they were unanimous, or he thought they were, in reference to this subject. The Senator was mistaken.

Mr. WADE. I do not think I said the Senate were unanimous.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I mean the committee.

Mr. WADE. I supposed so.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I did not think it then necessary to interrupt the Senator, as I believed that in the progress of the debate that fact would become known to the Senate. But, sir, the Senate, in the modifications of the resolution before them, have arrived very much at the same conclusion to which their committee had arrived. The resolution which came from the Committee on Military Affairs was presented not so much as a proposition expressing the views and opinions of that committee as with a view to place the subject before the Senate, that they might act upon it as they thought proper under the circumstances. That proposition has been presented to the Senate; it has received modifications; it has been curtailed, and almost entirely separated from its objectionable features. I do not know that I should refuse to vote for it in its present shape. There are, however, some objections to it; and it does seem to me that a proposition so important, a proposition which affects so much the interest, the feeling, and the policy of the country, should be recommended to that committee, and that that committee, with the benefit of the remarks that have been made and the propositions which have been suggested, should present to the Senate and the country something upon which Senators can act so that hereafter no one will ever regret the act or the vote which he gave upon it.

Sir, the recommendations which have come from eminent Senators from New England, and from the Senator from Ohio, advising barbarous treatment to rebel prisoners on account of barbarities practiced toward ours can find no sympathy in the people they represent. I believe if there was established in either of those States a camp for rebel prisoners, and it was duly guarded by persons who would treat rebel prisoners with the barbarities suggested in the beginning of this debate, that the men who practiced them upon defenseless prisoners would have no place in those States.

Early in the history of this war it was my privilege to have intimate and near friends connected with the Army. It was my good fortune to be with them upon the battle-field. I saw many of them wounded, others struck down. The patriotic people of my State demanded of me that their remains should be returned to the State; that the ground of that State should be hallowed by their bones and remains; that their history should be a part of that of the State. In obedience to that demand I traveled with a proper escort to endeavor to secure their bodies; and what did I find? I found that the friends whom I had left wounded upon the battle-field had been murdered after we had left. I found the dead that we were obliged to leave upon the battle-field with their faces downward as a mark of indignity. I found the heads of the bravest and best of my companions severed from their bodies to be used as drinking cups by southern rebels. Of the remains of some of the best, most intelligent, and bravest officers that ever served any cause, I found but the portion left from a bonfire.

The proposition now would be that the American troops and American generals should retaliate practices of that character upon rebel soldiers either upon the battle-field or in the prison camp. I could not, in the beginning, agree to that proposition. I asked of the men who represented those dead heroes that, instead of imitating the example of the enemy, they should prove themselves better and braver soldiers upon the battle-field; they should show by their courage and their endurance that they were better and higher in the glorious cause in which they were engaged; that they would perform with that motive before them ten thousand times more of service to the country than they could with their hands covered with deeds so black as those which it was proposed to avenge.

Sir, the cause of this treatment of our men by the rebels has not been so thoroughly understood as it might have been. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] has suggested to you the good effects that have been produced by our retaining the rebel prisoners in our hands. I agree heartily with the suggestion that he made early in this debate. I know something of the disposition of our people early in this war to let their blows strike lightly upon the head of this rebellion. I know that the disposition of our soldiers was not to form their lines as steadily as they should, and to do the real, hard service that was demanded of them. This treatment has been practiced by the rebels upon Union soldiers to bring about the very result that has been brought about, and that is, an exchange of prisoners. It was known that the exchange proposed between this Government and the authorities of rebellion was unfair; it was known that they captured private citizens and endeavored to offset them with our soldiers. We refused to agree to it; and these retaliatory measures on their part have been the means of producing the results which have come to us in the newspapers and otherwise.

I do not mean to apologize in any way for these barbarities, but this much I will say: that the refusal of this Government to exchange has wrought up the soldiers of our armies and the people to the prosecution of this war with an energy unknown to any other people; and the victories of Nashville, the campaign of Atlanta, the splendid success of Savannah, consummated by the capture of Fort Fisher, may be as much owing to the sacrifices and sufferings of our brave men in rebel prisons as to any other cause. While I will not for a moment upon this floor apologize in the least for the barbarities of this cruel foe, I yet see something in the course they have pursued to the advantage of this country, and a greater reason not to imitate their example. Sir, there will be no individuals or families who will receive from the people of this country more real respect and adoration than will go forth from the whole people to these suffering heroes. I believe it has been their fortune, suffering as they have, to do more real service to their country in this, its greatest emergency, than ten thousand times the efforts of any other of our citizens. I believe that if you had put upon our advancing armies the strength that we have withheld in our prison camps, if you had put the thirty or forty thousand rebel troops whom we held as prisoners again in arms against this Government and against our soldiers, the result of their efforts would have put back the success of this contest for years, and would have produced more suffering and more disastrous effects than the suffering that has been brought on our heroes and martyrs in southern prisons.

It was my province on Sunday evening to listen to the addresses before the Christian Commission—a commission which is part and parcel of the country's cause and of the country's heroes. We there heard an address from the person whose testimony was presented to the Senate yesterday morning. What was his advice? Not that which is recommended by the Senator from Ohio. He suggested no such thing, although cognizant of all the brutalities that have been spoken of for the last twenty-two months. "But," said he, "will you place over rebel prisoners men who have suffered, men who have been brutalized, men who for twenty-two months have been so impaired in their intellectual and physical capacity as to be not men, but brutes? Would you place such men over defenseless prisoners? I advise retaliation thus far, to prevent these barbarities; but my instincts, and the instincts of every patriotic officer in the service, and of every true man, are against it. Arrange a system, perfect it, bring it to the proper authorities, bring it to the President of the United States, to all men who have an opportunity to act in the matter, and to act quickly; but do not brutalize your acts, do not become savages, because savages are around you; but institute some measures of retaliation." That, sir, is the evidence which comes to us, and which we are advised to receive as the testimony of a man who has witnessed these sufferings.

Sir, I shall occupy the attention of the Senate no longer. I desire that this resolution, with all the amendments which have been proposed to it, shall be recommended to the Committee on Military Affairs, from whence it originated. I believe that such a reference is eminently proper. I believe that no hasty resolutions should come from any individual or from any set of individuals in this Senate upon a question so important as this, until some committee or some organized body shall have the matter before them and suggest something proper in the case. Let the committee suggest what is proper to the Senate, and let us then act upon it.

Mr. SUMNER. I desire to express my thanks to the Senator from Rhode Island, not only for the practical humanity but for the practical wisdom of his remarks. He is right on the question of humanity, soldier and Senator as he is. He is right, also, on the question of the reference. A matter of so much importance, debated so many days, with regard to which there have been so many conflicting opinions, so many different propositions, differing from each other more or less, ought not to be acted upon without the intervention of a committee of this body. It is for just such a case as this that we have committees, who, as we are told by parliamentary authors, in familiar words, are the eyes and ears of the body. Never, sir, was there an occasion when eyes and ears were more wanted than on a proposition which has been the subject of such a conflicting discussion. If there was a general harmony in the statements on this subject, if these differences had not been developed day by day in the discussion, then I should say, let us act directly on the proposition; but, under the circumstances of the case, I say that it is according to parliamentary usage and according to common sense that this question should go to a committee.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I do not hold myself responsible for the fate of this resolution. It is under the care of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] and he knows how to take care of it. It is not his habit to put any of his children to a charity school. And if only the fate of this resolution were at stake I should not trouble the Senate with another word during this debate. But I have sat here, Mr. President, four or five days, and heard for the first time in my life myself arraigned and prosecuted for a want of humanity. I have said that I did not hold myself responsible for the fate of the resolution, but I hold myself responsible for the support I give it; and, if I may be allowed to make use of an expression which is not so much in vogue in this Senate Chamber as it used to be, I wish to say that I hold myself "personally responsible" for it. Sir, I did not come to the Senate of the United States to be taught what was or was not humane, and I am not likely to learn it here, I fear. If I know anything about it now, or if I ever shall, I learned it before I came here; and I did not learn it from the jurists, nor from the publicists, nor from the poets. What little sentiment of humanity I have I acquired before I was put to the schools; I acquired it when I was put to my mother's breast; and I beg leave to tell the Senate that so many of them as have not drawn their notions of humanity from the same great fountain had better not parade their humanity here too freely, for it is not reliable.

Day after day, during this debate, every one of those who have asked you in the name of facts which make the nation shudder to do something to put an end to these enormities have been held up as criminals against the holiest dictates of humanity, as offenders against the religion of the land, as criminals in the judgment of civilized mankind; and Senators read us authorities here to prove it. When the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] harangued the Senate on Saturday last against barbarity, I enjoyed the occasion as much as any man who listened to him.

I like to see great faculties put face to face with great infamy, and I do not enjoy the spectacle any the less because the infamy is imaginary and not real; I think I enjoy it the better for that very reason. I think I would better like to see John C. Heenansparring with a dummy than with Tom Sayers, because you can see the play of the muscle and the spring of the sinew just as well, and the beauty of the spectacle is not marred by hearing any groans or seeing any bruised and lacerated flesh. So I say I enjoyed the occasion the other day all the better because there was not any real barbarity here for the Senator from Massachusetts to hit. I liked to see him strike out at it all the better because of that fact; and he admitted that it was not here. He said that the proposition before the Senate had been so changed that there was nothing left of it but the name retaliation. Against the specific proposition before the Senate he had not a word to say in behalf of humanity, of Christianity, of civilization, of poetry, or of philosophy; but he could not forbear the opportunity to impress upon the Senate and the world the notion that some of us here had been, at some previous time, defending a measure which was full of barbarity, which was but an imitation of that of which we complain.

Sir, was that fair and just toward those who have differed from him here on the floor of the Senate? Was it just and fair toward that Senator who has brought forward this proposition, and consented to its being put into this form, [Mr. WADE,] in order to convince the Senate and to convince the world that he did not intend and did not attempt any of those measures which have been ascribed to him? He sees and consents to his own resolution being remodeled and remodeled, until now they who carp at it most and criticize it most bitterly can point to no ugly feature in it. But was it fair to say to him that he had ever been the advocate of anything that was monstrous or barbarous? What he intended, if it were not proved by the language of the resolution which he originally introduced, is abundantly proved by his consenting to its being put into language against which the Senator from Massachusetts can file no protest whatever.

Mr. SUMNER. I made my protest in my remarks.

Mr. HOWE. Against this resolution?

Mr. SUMNER. Yes.

Mr. HOWE. Then I misunderstood the Senator's remarks, and have misread them. I say, Mr. President, that authorities have been brought forward here to convict us who support this resolution of barbarity and of inhumanity. They are not witnesses to the point; they are not fairly treated, and we are not fairly treated by their being produced here.

The Senator from Massachusetts read to us an extract from a recent speech of the lamented Everett. It is to be noticed that the Senator—and that was fair in him; it is entirely allowable by the rules of debate—look pains to eulogize every witness whom he introduced here. I do not complain of that; but if you will consent to look aside from the character of the witnesses and just listen to what they state, I shall not feel at all incalculated by the testimony they give. Mr. Everett says—speaking, if I do not mistake the occasion, before a public meeting called to concert measures for furnishing relief, not to starving prisoners, but to a hungry population in Savannah—

"I believe that the best way in which we can retaliate upon the South for the cruel treatment of our prisoners is for us to continue to treat their prisoners with entire humanity and all reasonable kindness, and not only so, but to seize every opportunity like the present to go beyond this."

He was not talking to the resolution which the Senator from Ohio has been defending, or to any modification of that resolution before the Senate; he was talking to a public meeting in behalf of a public charity, appealing purely to the benevolence of those who heard him, and appealing to that benevolence for a specific purpose. He was not talking to a legislature having to grapple with a monstrous crime; he was not attempting to instruct us upon the doctrines of international law.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will bear in mind that he lays down the rule of international law there. It was for that that I quoted the passage, not for the sentiment, not for the eloquence.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator reminds me that the witness laid down the rule of international law.

Let us see in what terms and from what standpoint he did it:

"Indeed, it is no more than our duty to treat the prisoner well. The law of nations requires it."

Unquestionably it requires it.

"The Government that refuses or neglects it does not deserve the name of civilized."

Does any man doubt that when Mr. Everett struck that point in his remarks and made that observation, he had in his mind, not the conduct of our Government, but the conduct of those authorities against which we remonstrate and protest to-day? From that point onward he commenced to arraign, not our Government nor anything we had done, nor anything we proposed to do, but he commenced to arraign the rebel authorities for their violations of the law of nations:

"The Government that refuses or neglects it does not deserve the name of civilized. Even inability is no justification. If you are yourself so exhausted that you cannot supply your prisoner with a sufficient quantity of wholesome food, you are bound, with or without exchange, to set him free."

Speaking manifestly with direct reference to the action and to the excuses, not of our own Government, but of the rebel authorities. But he lays down the law correctly. Who disputes it? It is the duty of a nation to treat its prisoners well. That is the law. The exception to the law is just such a case as is presented here, when we are not to prescribe treatment as a mere end, but when we are to prescribe treatment as a means to an end.

I am asked by the Senator from Massachusetts to read the last sentence. I will:

"You have no more right to starve than to poison him. It will, however, be borne in mind that while the hard fare of our prisoners is defended by the southern leaders on the ground that it is as good as that of their own soldiers, at the same time they maintain that their harvests are abundant and their armies well fed."

"You have no more right to starve than to poison him," says the witness, speaking still not to our Government but to the rebel authorities who alone have starved; speaking evidently to them, because he goes on to say that the justification which the rebel authorities make for that starvation is utterly untenable:

"It will, however, be borne in mind that, while the hard fare of our prisoners is defended by the southern leaders on the ground that it is as good as that of their own soldiers, at the same time they maintain that their harvests are abundant and their armies well fed."

The next witness—

Mr. SUMNER. Finish that passage from Mr. Everett, if you please.

Mr. HOWE. I will.

"There is no merit treating a prisoner with common humanity; it is simply infamous and wicked to treat him otherwise."

Mr. SUMNER. That is the point: that is the law of nations.

Mr. HOWE. The law of nations! We are not disputing about what the law of nations is. The simple question is, upon whom was Mr. Everett enforcing the laws of nations? Upon the Senate of the United States or upon the rebel authorities? If the Senator insists that he was instructing the Senate of the United States in reference to our action upon this resolution, I differ from him altogether. The evidence to the contrary is patent upon the face of the extract.

Again, Professor Francis Lieber is placed upon the stand; a competent witness, says the Senator, upon a question of international law. Undoubtedly competent; and if it had been his purpose or his aim to instruct us in international law I should have listened to what he said with as much respect as the Senator from Massachusetts or anybody else. Professor Lieber says:

"No mawkish sentimentality has induced the writer to express his views. He has had dear friends in those southern pens, which have become the very symbols of revolting barbarity, but he desires, for this very reason, that the subject be weighed without passion, which never counsels well; especially without the passion of mere vengeance. Let us bring down this general call for retaliation to practical and detailed measures. It is supposed, then, that retaliation is resolved upon; what next?"

Now, admitting that Professor Lieber is abundantly competent to testify upon a rule of international law, yet if he is asked to testify whether a given measure is within or without the rules of international law, it would be necessary for him to show not merely that he understands what international law commands and what it prohibits, but also that he understands what the specific measure is. I would, therefore, before I gave implicit credit to the testimony of Professor Lieber on this point, want to examine him on his voir dire; I should want to know whether he understood the measure upon which the Senate is deliberating as well as that he understands the code about which he undertakes to instruct us. He shows manifestly in this instance that he does not understand the measure which is before the Senate; for he says, bringing it down to practice:

"It is supposed, then, that retaliation is resolved upon; what next? The order is given to harass, starve, expose, and torture, say twenty thousand prisoners in our hands until their bones pierce the skin, and they die idiots in their filth."

Professor Lieber, well as he understands international law, does not at all understand the measure before the Senate. No such command (as has been repeatedly pointed out) could issue upon the enactment of this resolution in any form in which it has been proposed. It has no retrospective action whatever; it looks steadily to the future. It does not propose to starve any man in the world; it proposes simply to put an end, a final and speedy end, to starvation. The command would not go to take twenty thousand men or one man and starve him until his bones pierced through the skin and he died in his own filth. The command would simply go to the men who have been practicing these enormities, who have been engaged in the wholesale work of starvation, to stop it. To stop it at what peril? At the peril that if they do not commence to feed our prisoners in their hands, we will withdraw the rations which we are daily meting out to their prisoners in our hands. And the command does not go to our agents; it goes to the agents of that rebel organization.

Mr. President, Senators, steadily shutting their eyes and ears to what this resolution says, and what it means, have contrived to give it a bad name. Nay, I do not find any fault with the name; the name is well enough. They call it not merely retaliation, which it is, but retaliation in kind. I do not complain so much of the name they give it as the manner in which they treat that name. If the Senator from Massachusetts, in the tragic mood in which he spoke the other day, had seen fit to call it the balm of a thousand roses, it would have sounded bad to almost all listeners. No matter what name you call a thing by, if you cram your countenance chock full of horror, and throw a sepulchral tone into your voice, it will sound bad, no doubt. But it is after all only retaliation. There is nothing bad about retaliation. All say that. It is strictly in accordance with the laws of nations. All acknowledge that.

Well, let us admit that what we propose here is retaliation in kind; is there anything bad about retaliation in kind, like for like? What is retaliation in kind? If they assassinate a man, retaliation in that case would be to execute a man. If they take a tooth, retaliation in that case would be to take another. If they tear your jacket, retaliation in that case would be to tear another jacket. Necessarily, retaliation in kind is not awful, is it? In reference to the particular evil with which we have to deal, I beg leave to say that retaliation in kind not only is not the terrible enormity it is held to be, but it is the mildest species of retaliation that you can apply.

Sensors all tell us that retaliation is right; retaliation is entirely in accord with the law of nations; retaliation is abundantly indorsed by civilization, by Christianity, by Professor Lieber, and by the Senator from Massachusetts. Retaliation is all right, but you must mark the limitations, says the Senator from Massachusetts. And what are they? That you must not be inhuman? No; but you may be humane, I take it. You must not starve a prisoner. We do not want to starve any one. We are trying to subserve a humane purpose. We do not mean to be driven from it. But what sort of retaliation, I put it to the common sense of the Senate, can possibly be applied to the evil which we mean to prevent, but retaliation in kind?

Sir, what do we want to do? There is no vengeance hinted at in anything which is proposed to the Senate. We simply wish to put an end to an enormity. We are about to enact a law, not to command citizens within the reach of our process, but to command a people beyond the reach of our process. We want them to give food and shelter to the men to whom they are bound to render it by the laws of war, by the laws of civilization, and by the laws of Christianity. How shall we compel them to do it? Retaliation is the only instrumentality offered to you. But what kind of retaliation? Not "in kind," says the Senator from Massachusetts. What then? We are compelled to tell these authorities, "If you do not feed our men we will do something, not to you, because you are not within our reach, but to these men of yours who are in our reach." Now, what do we do? Take out a given number of them and shoot them, in order to compel them to feed our men to-morrow? No; that would not be retaliation in kind. It would be retaliation; not retaliation in kind, but it would be barbarous, infinitely more barbarous than to tell them, "If you do not feed our prisoners to-morrow we will not feed your prisoners to-morrow." That is retaliation in kind; but it is the mildest, the most legitimate form of retaliation that my mind can conceive of, and I have heard nothing else pointed out. You have no means in the world of coercing these authorities to do what duty requires of them, excepting the power you have over these prisoners in your hands. How will you apply that power? If you want shelter for your prisoners, withhold shelter from theirs. You may withhold food, you may withhold clothing, withhold anything else. You cannot apply any physical punishment to them, because that is more inhuman.

Sir, instead of this proposition being so monstrous and barbarous as it has been constantly denounced, if you will take it right before your eyes and look at it, it is nothing in the world more than equitable process, of sequestration to enforce the specific performance of a duty, a most equitable, and a most Christian duty. I have said, therefore, that I do not feel condemned under the testimony of Mr. Edward Everett, nor under the testimony of Professor Lieber. I have shown you abundantly that Mr. Everett was not testifying for our instruction, and I have shown you abundantly that Professor Lieber did not understand the measure which we have before the Senate. But the Senator from Massachusetts was not content with arraying these witnesses against us, he put Mr. Shakespeare on the stand—Shakespeare, who was "both jurist and poet," we are told. I cannot deny that he was a poet of very respectable pretensions. He might have been a lawyer. However that may have been, I did not profess to be as well read in Mr. Shakespeare as the Senator from Massachusetts undoubtedly is, but according to my understanding of him, I have read the tragedy of Macbeth, and I never supposed that really it was the intention of the great dramatist to produce Mr. Macbeth in the character of an illustrator and delineator of humanity or of an expounder of international law. [Laughter.]

Sir, there are two or three other questions about this whole matter. You all agree that there is a crime in daily perpetration here on this continent and within our jurisdiction, a crime the magnitude of which blanches all of you, and you all agree that that crime ought to be stopped. Now tell me how you would do it. Seeing the numbers of our men and the sufferings of our men there, I proposed a year ago, as I could not get our men exchanged, to make a levy en masse of the American people to go down there and take them out of custody. That was considered a radical measure, and it was dismissed. There they are still.

Gentlemen tell us, "Exchange for them." We are trying to exchange, and have been trying, but we cannot exchange, because it takes two parties to make an exchange, and, as I showed you the other day, the other party will not agree to it. As fast as they do agree we do exchange.

The Senator from Massachusetts who sits at my left [Mr. Wilson] says "Negotiate." Without this resolution you send commissioners to the rebel authorities, and what in the world can they say? "Release our prisoners." "No, we cannot do it." "Feed our prisoners." "No, we will not do it." What else can they ask? Negotiate? What have they got to offer? Will these commissioners say, "If you will feed and clothe our prisoners, if you will shelter them, we will shelter and feed and clothe your prisoners." They say, "You do that now, and you dare not do the contrary from that; your Senate forbids it; your Legislature forbids it." What will you do? What can the commissioners say? But pass this resolution and then you can negotiate with effect; then your agents of exchange will know what to say. Then that brave, that gallant, that heroic, and that Christian man, as I understand him to be, John E. Mulford, can say to these authorities, "I am told by the Government of the American people to tell you, in the name and by the authority of those millions, that if you do not cease your barbarities, if you do not feed these men that you are now starving, and shelter them, the command has gone forth that your men in our hands shall not be fed, and shall not be sheltered." That is inhuman, is it? Well, the only theory upon which any sort of inhumanity can be made out is that the rebels will not consent to this, that they will not consent for the sake of having their prisoners fed to feed ours.

Senators have told you over and over again that they deny this conclusion; that it is not the fact; that it is not the legitimate inference; that if humanity does not compel them to do their duty toward our prisoners, policy will compel when they see that it is necessary to the feeding of their own. I believe it; but I am willing to follow this process of sequestration to the end of it, and I will speak, for a moment, upon the assumption that they will refuse, as Senators assume they will.

Suppose when your agent of exchange goes down there and tells them, "This is the law; you must give bread to our prisoners or bread is taken from yours;" and they tell you, "Take your bread from our prisoners; we care not for that; we will not give bread to yours;" what then? You must violate the resolution or you must withhold these supplies; but you say it is cruel and inhuman to withhold supplies. There is no other course for you to take. Go back to those estranged, rebellious citizens of yours and say to them, "Guilty of treason as you are, you have been in our hands for months and we have sheltered you; we have fed you; rebels to our authority, traitors as you are, we have furnished you the treatment which belongs to humanity; we are willing to do it; but men who resist your treason have been taken prisoners by those authorities that have commanded you; they are not sheltered; they are not fed; we have visited those authorities, and we have told them that they must administer this comfort, that if they did not we would visit you with like treatment, and they absolutely refuse; they say, 'We do not care what treatment you bestow upon our men in your hands, we will not feed or shelter the Federal soldiery.'"

Now, sir, you will say to these prisoners, "Are you willing to be longer instruments in the hands of authorities who practice such barbarities not only toward their enemies but toward their own soldiery; are you willing to be longer the agents and instruments of an authority that will turn you out to be treated as they treat our prisoners?" What will they say? I think they would say, "No; we have followed the standards of rebellion long enough; we have followed the flag of barbarism as far as we can afford to go, and henceforth we will follow the flag of humanity, the flag of loyalty, the flag of the Union."

But suppose they would not say that; suppose we are utterly mistaken both as to what the rebel authorities would do, and what the rebel prisoners would do; and suppose they should say, "We are still loyal to this barbarity which has raised its shocking and monstrous head down there; we know they mete out starvation to your prisoners daily; we are glad that they do it; we stand by the authority which decrees that, and we will fight their battles when we can get out of your prisons; we are ready to do it, notwithstanding its utter want of humanity." What will you say to them, then? I am following the lessons of this resolution, as I understand it; following them clear to the end. What will you say to them, then? There they are, avowing their advocacy of this great monstrosity, taking part in it, committing themselves to it, and to all the cruelty and savagery there is in it. What will you say to them? I do not know what you will say, I am sure; I have some doubt about that; but I have not the slightest doubt as to what I should say myself. I should say to them that they had incumbered the face of the earth too long. I should say to them that if I was more embarrassed in my movements, I would still allow them space to linger on and air to breathe; but inasmuch as it took bread and meat to feed them, and inasmuch as it took loyal force to guard them, and inasmuch as I wanted this loyal force to attack the rebel masses which stand around our prisoners in their dens and starve them daily, I would say to them, "We cannot furnish you these guards any more, and you shall not incur the earth any longer."

To make myself perfectly intelligible, I have supposed an extremity of barbarity in two classes of men which I know cannot be found; but when you find that extremity of barbarity, what will you do but obey God and end it? If you find any milder means of accomplishing this end, very well. We tell you over and over again that we want to attain but a single end, not the punishment of anybody for anything that has been done, but the relief of human beings from suffering which is inhuman. Show us any means milder than this for attaining that end and we will take them and follow them most gladly, but we say that if we can accomplish it the end must be and shall be attained, and until you stop merely denouncing barbarism, and turn your attention to some practical way of ending the barbarism, we must follow the track, or rather, for I speak only for myself, I must follow the only path which I see open to that end.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. If the Senate will pardon me for a very few moments, I will endeavor to direct the attention of the body to precisely the present position of the question. Some thirty days ago or more the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WILKINSON] introduced a resolution on the subject of rebel barbarities perpetrated against our prisoners, which resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Some two or three weeks since I had the honor to present a memorial from a portion of the people of Indiana upon the same subject, asking for retaliation, and asking further that discharged Union soldiers from rebel prisons should be placed in the command of rebel prisoners in the North. At that point the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] introduced these resolutions which have been debated for the last two weeks. The memorial and the resolutions were referred to the Military Committee, and they reported after mature deliberation and after an investigation upon the whole subject. When that report was made, various modifications and amendments were proposed, and after a lengthy discussion one of the distinguished Senators from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] proposed an amendment by way of substitute for the whole report of the committee, which recited these rebel barbarities and atrocities, and wound up with a general declaration that it would outrage Christian public sentiment and Christian civilization to do anything. That is precisely the tenor and scope of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. Recognizing the great evil inflicted upon our prisoners, and reciting in the most eloquent terms their barbarities, it wound up with a lame conclusion that our hands were tied, we could do nothing without outraging civilization, Christianity, and our common humanity. That is precisely as I understand the tenor and effect of the resolutions of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] then introduced his proposition for the appointment of commissaries of prisoners or commissioners of prisons to visit the rebel States and make arrangements in reference to ameliorating the condition of our prisoners, and to facilitate exchanges. That proposition is substantially repeated by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.]

Now, how do we stand? The resolution as reported by the committee was retaliation in kind until these rebel barbarities shall cease. I prefer that, to-day, to any other mode of redress. Why do we retaliate at all? Because it is necessary to protect our own prisoners. Where, then, is the limit to retaliation? Simply the relief of our prisoners; and if we stop short of that we are playing a mere child's play, idle and nonsensical. We have no right to retaliate except to accomplish a good end, and that end is to relieve our prisoners. If we stop short of that, the whole thing is a mockery, a delusion, and a humbug, and I will not stop short of that point to whatsoever extreme it shall carry me. I am for retaliation earnestly and honestly, and no sham; and I am for retaliation until the object shall be accomplished.

I have, Mr. President, but one brother, whom I love as I love myself; if he were a rebel in arms to-day against this Government, I would take him in my arms, as Abraham did Isaac, and offer him upon the altar of the country, and ask Almighty God to bless the sacrifice. I have none of this squeamishness, none of this sympathy for these rebel prisoners; I would retaliate up to the point of achieving the object we have in view.

I set out not to argue this resolution but to show you now that there is nothing to refer to the Military Committee. My distinguished colleague from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] says it is highly appropriate and proper that all such questions should go to a committee. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] says that these committees of the House are eyes and ears to the House. Is this measure suddenly thrust upon the attention of the Senate? It has already been before a committee for more than one month, and it comes here upon the report of a committee. That report has been modified by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] until it meets the approbation, I venture to say, of every single Senator upon this floor; and yet we are asked to refer it and to delay further. Is there a Senator upon this floor who does not believe in the right of retaliation? Is there a Senator upon this floor who doubts the rebel barbarities against our prisoners? Then if you believe in retaliation at all, you say the limit is the usages of civilized nations and the laws of war. That is precisely the language of the present resolution, that the President shall be directed to retaliate upon these rebel prisoners according to the laws of nations and the usages of war. That is precisely the resolution as it now stands. Then what do you gain by a reference to a committee? Different phraseology! If you intend to do anything, if you believe in the right of retaliation at all, how else can you retaliate? You say you would not retaliate in kind. I would. But suppose you would not; the resolution is now so modified as to use precisely the words that you wish to have incorporated in it, that we shall retaliate according to the laws of nations and the usages of civilized warfare. That is the resolution as now modified. Then what are you debating? Has it come to this, that there is a grave debate in the Senate as to whether we have a right to say that we will retaliate according to the laws of nations and the usages of civilized warfare? That is the whole of it. Are you ready to vote upon that? Your prisoners are dying by thousands daily in southern prisons, without shelter, without food, without clothing, lying upon the bare ground with the inhospitable sky above them, and with their dying fingers are digging their own graves, hundreds becoming insane, so reduced that they are joining the enemy, taking the oath of allegiance to the rebel government, rather than undergo the pangs of starvation; and we are here debating whether we have a right to retaliate according to the laws of civilized warfare, and that is the whole of it; and who doubts that? If there is a man who doubts it, while I might respect his motives, I should certainly not sympathize with his action.

I am ready to retaliate. I believe the people require it. I believe the soldiers in the field require it. But gentlemen say to retaliate is barbarous and would shock the civilized world—a high-sounding phrase, meaning less than nothing in this great argument. Suppose you present the other side of it. We do not propose to retaliate as a matter of revenge or of vengeance for past wrongs, but to prevent these very atrocities that all admit. Suppose it should be flashed over the wires, suppose it should be carried over the ocean, that this great people having called a million men into the field, when they were starving and suffering in southern prisons, refused to defend and protect their own soldiers by the only means possible by which they can be protected, you would be a by-word and a reproach forever in the history of civilization. We do not do this from any purpose of vengeance, but to protect our own soldiers from these rebel barbarities. Yet gentlemen say the civilized world is to be shocked. What is the civilized world? What is the Christian public sentiment of Christendom to-day? Do they sympathize with you now? Let England and France tell the story. With the exception of the German States and Russia, there is no Christian public sentiment that sympathizes with us. Would England be shocked at such a course as this of retaliation? If so, read the bloody history of the Irish rebellion, or the bloody history of the Sepoy rebellion in India, where fifty Sepoy prisoners were tied at the mouths of British cannon and blown to destruction; yet they are to be shocked because we resort to this system of retaliation! The truth is, the laws of nations have nothing to do with our punishment of these traitorous, insurgent, rebel citizens. It is for us and us alone to measure out the meed of their punishment, past, present, or to come. We are sovereign of all Powers upon earth as to them, and we are to adopt our own punishment; and even if it should be unheard of and terrible for this terrible and unheard-of iniquity, no other nation could object.

Then why refer this resolution? The committee had it two months, and we have debated it two weeks. We have come now to a common conclusion; for I venture to say that when the vote is taken by yeas and nays upon the resolution as now modified not one member of this Senate will record his vote against it.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] says that committees of this body are the eyes and the ears of the body; and therefore, after passing a high eulogium upon eyes and ears, he hopes this resolution, with the amendments, will be recommitted. Well, sir, eyes and ears are very important members of the human body. I admit they are important; but when men are dying by thousands and tens of thousands, dying of starvation, and demanding at our hands a measure of redress, what is required of us is heads and hearts and hands to act immediately, and not eyes and ears.

Mr. President, immediate action is what is demanded from us. I see no object in referring this matter to any committee. I believe there is not a member of this body whose mind is not made up as to whether he will protect these helpless prisoners now suffering and dying by thousands, or whether he will not.

Yesterday the other Senator from Massachusetts, not now in his seat, [Mr. WILSON,] called me to account for a remark which I then made. He said that I had threatened him. Sir, I did no such thing. I stated a fact which he and every other member of this body will find to be a fact, and that was that this account was not to be settled here upon this floor with his colleagues, but with his constituents at home. I uttered no threat, I made a simple statement of a fact. Every man here must meet this question at home. He must meet these returned soldiers and he must meet the friends of those who have died of these rebel barbarities. But again the Senator said:

"As I listened to-day to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] and then again to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] I thought the old slave-masters had come back again. I thought I witnessed all their insolence and something more than their coarseness."

That is a mere matter of taste. It is a matter which I do not propose to discuss, much less to discuss it with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, a gentleman who is as much a master of deportment, as we all know, as Mr. Turveydrop; a man who, in matters of taste, beauty of expression, finish of argument, refinement of language, cannot be approached. He is unapproachable. Therefore, sir, I pass that by as a mere matter of taste with which I have nothing to do.

But, sir, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] has called me to task for pretty much the same thing. I can only repeat, with regard to the alleged threat, that it was no threat, but a simple statement of fact. The Senator from Indiana objects to another statement that I made, which was that these rebels were "hellish," or something to that effect. On reflection I think I have done an injustice, and no man is more ready to apologize for an injustice done than I am; but when I apologize for that remark it will not be to the rebels, but to the inhabitants of hell. I do not believe that any barbarities equal to theirs have ever been perpetrated by any people on earth, nor do I believe that the inhabitants of any region that we read of in sacred or profane history could be found to be guilty of the barbarities that have been perpetrated by these rebels.

The Senator says the time will come when I shall regret that I have used this strong language relative to these rebels. Sir, when those men who have instigated these barbarities come back and associate with us, meet us in the social circle and in the halls of legislation, meet us on friendly terms of intercourse, then the Senator says that I shall regret that I have used this strong language. Sir, when the originators of these barbarities come back upon this floor and associate with us upon terms of equality, that Senator may take them to his bosom, but he will not find any loyal man who will greet them as living men. These men are to be punished for their crimes; they are to be punished for their barbarities; they are to be punished as traitors and murderers, and not welcomed back into the social circle or legislative halls by any loyal man who now stands by this Government, in my estimation. I certainly shall never regret that I have done them justice at this or at any other time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, it is not my intention to enter into this discussion; it has not been my intention at any time since its commencement to do so, and I do not propose to detain the Senate for more than a moment. I understand, however, that upon the motion to refer to the Military Committee the yeas and nays have been ordered, and we have been notified that in case that motion fails the yeas and nays are to be called upon the final passage of the joint resolution. I have not engaged in the discussion, because I have no taste for its sickening details. If one half is true that is alleged by the Federal authorities against the confederate authorities in reference to their cruelties to prisoners, or if half is true of what is alleged by the confederate authorities against the Federal authorities, as we read in extracts from their newspapers, then it is vain either for them or for us to boast of Christianity or freedom from barbarism. If these statements be true, then since the dawn of civilization there has never existed upon the face of the earth a people more barbarous and unchristian than the people of America, both North and South.

I admit that it is in the power of this Government or any other Government, any belligerent Power whatever, to resort to retaliation. The question with me, however, is whether this measure as proposed, advising the President of the United States to resort to it now, would lead to any practical good. I doubt it.

The question has been discussed in every possible form in which it could be presented except one; every suggestion possible to be made but one for the relief of the suffering Federal prisoners has been made. That one I propose to make; and whether it be popular or unpopular, whether it shall be heralded by the papers as patriotic or unpatriotic, is a matter of indifference to me. That measure is peace. If these acts of cruelty which are alleged to have been perpetrated have been perpetrated, it is only additional proof that this war ought never to have been begun; but having been begun, that it ought instantly to stop. If these allegations be true, these enormities disgrace man and reduce him to the level of the brute; ay, sir, reduce him to the level of the fiends.

I am not ashamed to raise my humble voice in the Senate of the United States in behalf of peace. Peace descends from heaven; war springs from hell; and when hell's agency is at work, you cannot expect the blessings of Heaven. It is seldom, sir, that I can approve of any act of the President of the United States; but if the rumor be true which is current to-day that commissioners are on their way from the South to this capital to treat for peace, and that that is the result of an informal message from the President of the United States, I will take occasion here, while approving but little that he has done before, to approve his action in that respect. Sooner than resort to the bloody scenes which may result from a system of retaliation, if it be true that commissioners are to meet to discuss the terms of peace, instead of invoking starvation and death upon any set of men, any set of prisoners, either Federal or confederate, I would, if it were in my power, cause the thunderbolts of the Almighty to roll and the lightnings of heaven to flash one continued flame between the contending armies, until these commissioners meet to consult in reference to the great boon of peace.

It is peace, sir, that this country wants. Give us peace, and no Federal soldiers will ever again rot in confederate bastilles or prisons, or starve in confederate pens. Give us peace, and the mother whose aching heart and streaming eyes you now witness will bless you for your deed. Give us peace, and instead of these acts of barbarism of which we hear, your land shall again bloom and blossom as the rose. Sir, in the place of retaliatory measures, in the stead of resorting to acts of cruelty to meet acts of cruelty, and to prevent them in the future, I propose that your commissioners meet, and I invoke you, if this be the honest aim of the President of the United States, lend him your willing and cordial aid; and then, sir, you will have no need for retaliation; then, sir, your soldiers no longer will be starved or murdered or ill treated; but they shall return to their homes long left, to cheer their families, to rejoice again that peace blesses the land, and that their country does not require any further sacrifice of life or blood upon their part.

I have said, Mr. President, more than I intended to say. I suggest, instead of all such measures as this, a cordial coöperation by the Congress of the United States with the Executive, if indeed he is engaged in that work, in restoring peace to a distracted land.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not intend to venture an opinion upon this resolution. It has been presented in almost every aspect of which the subject is at all capable. I desire, however, to urge upon the Senate to dispose of this question to-night. I think there is no view of it but what has been already presented. There are one or two bills that I desire to have acted upon to-morrow. I hope, therefore, we may have a vote upon the pending propositions without a word being said. I shall express my opinion by my vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to recommit the resolution with all the amendments and proposed amendments to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 10, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Carlile, Davis, Hendricks, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Salsbury, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Wright—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsay, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wilkinson, and Willey—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Grimes, Harding, Hicks, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Sprague, Trumbull, and Wilson—13.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE.]

Mr. SUMNER. To that amendment I have a further amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like, with the consent of the Senator from Massachusetts, to have it read as it now stands. I do not know that I understand it in its present form.

Mr. SUMNER. I was going to read it myself. The proposition as moved by the Senator from Ohio, by way of amendment to the resolution of the committee, is to insert as follows:

And that the executive and military authorities of the United States are hereby directed to retaliate upon the prisoners of the enemy in such manner and kind as shall be effective in deterring him from the perpetration in future of cruel and barbarous treatment of our soldiers.

At the suggestion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] the words "and kind" were struck out, and instead thereof were inserted the words "in conformity with the laws of nations;" and the proposition of the Senator from Ohio now stands in that form. It no longer requires retaliation in kind; but it does require retaliation in conformity with the laws of nations. When I had the honor of addressing the Senate on Saturday, I took the liberty of making a comment on that language. I characterized it as inadequate. It does not go far enough; it is dry; it is not sufficiently specific. Still further, sir, it is not in conformity with the precedents of our history. I then stated that if no other person made the motion, I should feel it my duty, before final action on this measure, to move a modification of this proposition so as to bring it in harmony with the precedents of our history, and also to make it, as I think, duly effective and applicable on this occasion. If you refer to the past precedent of our history, I mean the act of March 3, 1813, entitled "An act vesting in the President of the United States the power of retaliation," you will see that this is the language employed:

"The President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause full and ample retaliation to be made, according to the laws and usages of war among civilized nations."

And if Senators remember the eloquent remarks to which they listened only a few moments ago from the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] they cannot have forgotten how forcibly, more than once, he insisted that our resolution now required a retaliation in conformity with the laws of civilized nations. Now, sir, I propose to bring the resolution in harmony with the Senator's speech; in harmony with the precedents of our history; in harmony also with humanity. I move, therefore, to insert in the resolution, as it now stands, after the word "laws," in the twenty-eighth line, the phrase, "and usages of war among civilized," and then the sentence goes on, "nations;" so that it will read: "in conformity with the laws and usages of war among civilized nations."

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I have not the slightest objection to that, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON. How will it read then?

Mr. WADE. Let us hear how it will read as proposed to be amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

And that the executive and military authorities of the United States are hereby directed to retaliate upon the prisoners of the enemy in such manner, in conformity with the laws and usages of war among civilized nations, as shall be effective in deterring him from the perpetration in future of cruel and barbarous treatment of our soldiers.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not understand, sir, upon what ground it is that the Senator from Massachusetts insists that that particular phraseology is supported by historical precedent in the United States. As used in the statute which he assumes to quote, it had a certain significance, because that statute directing retaliation was aimed, as the Senator perfectly well knows, if he knows anything of the history of the war of 1812, at the barbarities committed by the British, not only by the British military authorities, as a civilized military force, but at barbarities committed by their Indian allies who were employed to assist the British arms in prosecuting that war. Hence Congress, when they enacted this statute of 1813, desiring to punish by some fitting retaliation these Indian barbarities committed upon American soldiers, enacted that the retaliation should be in accordance with the laws of civilized nations, in contradistinction undoubtedly from the laws and usages of savage nations, which prevailed among those tribes which were in league with the British. That, and that only, is the reason for the incorporation in that statute of the phrase "civilized nations."

There is no occasion for its introduction in the present resolution at all. We do not deny that the rebel confederacy are a civilized community. It is not denied here that they are a Christianized community. They are educated in the same moral and religious principles as ourselves. They have ever heretofore been regarded as a part of the civilized world, and are still regarded as such. Why then does the Senator from Massachusetts seek to characterize them as being savages, and not a part and parcel of the civilized world? It seems to me that this is carrying the poetic justice a little beyond the line of truth.

But, sir, as to historical precedents, I refer again, as I did the other day, to the precedent set by the Congress of 1799, at the time that General Washington was President of the United States. The language in that statute is this:

"That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, and he is hereby empowered and required, to cause the most rigorous retaliation to be exercised on any such citizens of the French Republic as have been, or hereafter may be, captured in pursuance of any of the laws of the United States."

There, sir, was General Washington's retaliation; there was the kind of retaliation which was enacted by the Congress of 1799; and in that we hear nothing said about the usages of civilized nations. Congress then took it for granted that the French people, against whom this retaliation was launched were a civilized, Christianized people, and they did not assume to treat them as mere savages, as the Senator from Massachusetts now assumes to treat the rebels in arms against the United States.

I hope, sir, that this amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, which has no object or aim aside from the mere attempt to stigmatize the rebels as savages, and nothing but savages, a fact which is not true except in the fancy of the Senator from Massachusetts, will not be adopted. There is no necessity for it. It is as much out of the line of American precedents, because it has but one precedent to stand upon, as is the resolution as offered now by the Senator from Ohio. Let us stick to the resolution as now agreed to by the Senator from Ohio and reject all these useless and trivial amendments.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I voted for the recommendation of this resolution in the hope that, if recommended, the language of it might be somewhat amended. As it stands now, it appears to contradict itself. It proceeds to say that it has become justifiable that the President should retaliate, and then goes on and directs the executive and military authorities to retaliate, and then concludes by saying that it is not intended to limit or restrict the President. It appears to me that the words, "the President," should be used in all cases instead of "the executive and military authorities."

I am in favor of the amendment just offered by the Senator from Massachusetts; but I will call his attention, and I will call the attention of the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] to the fact that, with his amendment in it, a further amendment is needed in the latter part of the resolution. The amendment of the Senator from Maine is, that this retaliation shall be in conformity with the laws of nations. The Senator from Massachusetts extends that a little further, and says it shall be in conformity to the laws and usages of civilized nations. Then the resolution goes on to say, to defeat both, that it is not intended by this resolution "to limit or restrict the power of the President to the modes or principles of retaliation herein mentioned." I understand that as distinctly affirming that it is not intended by this resolution to restrict the President to the modes and usages of civilized nations in the principles of retaliation. It was for these reasons that I voted to recommit this resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SUMNER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that I understand the amendment and its effect upon the resolution as it was originally before us at the time the amendment was offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator request that it be again read?

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the resolution as it will stand if amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment of the Senator from Ohio as it will stand if the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts should be adopted.

The Secretary read, as follows:

And that the executive and military authorities of the United States are hereby directed to retaliate upon the prisoners of the enemy in such manner, in conformity with the laws and usages of war among civilized nations, as shall be effective in deterring him from the perpetration, in future, of cruel and barbarous treatment of our soldiers.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the rest? Is that the end of the resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the amendment pending.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know it is, but I want to hear what follows.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read on.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Congress do not, however, intend by this resolution to limit or restrict the power of the President to the modes or principles of retaliation herein mentioned, but only to advise and require a resort to them as demanded by the occasion.

Mr. HOWARD. It is quite obvious, if this amendment is carried, that that latter clause will have to be stricken out, as being inapplicable to the resolution, and I shall make that motion.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

MR. JOHNSON. I was about to say that the criticism of the honorable Senator from West Virginia is perfectly correct, provided we are authorizing any retaliation which the laws of nations or the usages of war among civilized nations do not forbid, because we go on to say that although our advice to him is that he should only resort to such retaliation as the laws of nations and the usages of war do not forbid, yet he is to understand we do not mean to limit him in that way; he may be as savage and as barbarous as he thinks proper. I shall move at the proper time, therefore, to strike out that latter clause.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Carlisle, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Salisbury, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Farwell, Hale, Howard, Howe, Ramsey, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Grimes, Harding, Hicks, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, and Sprague—8.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

MR. JOHNSON. I move further to amend the resolution, in lines thirty-one, thirty-two, and thirty-three, by striking out the words, "to limit or restrict the power of the President to the modes or principles of retaliation herein mentioned, but" so that it will read, "Congress do, however, intend by this resolution only to advise a resort to them as demanded by the occasion."

MR. WADE. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. It will destroy the whole resolution. I hope we shall not take any further counsel of our enemies.

MR. HOWARD. I hope so, too.

MR. JOHNSON. The honorable member is very quick in favor of his own proposition. How does he know I am opposed to that? I have told him four or five times on the floor, and said to himself, that I was not, as it now stands. I have not offered this amendment with any view to impair its efficiency.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator will pardon the Chair for a moment, his amendment is not now in order. The question before the Senate now is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE.] When that shall be disposed of, it will be in order to entertain the amendment of the Senator.

MR. JOHNSON. Very well.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, as amended.

MR. VAN WINKLE. Is it not competent to amend that amendment?

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It is; but the words in the latter part of the resolution are not a part of the pending amendment.

MR. VAN WINKLE. I understand that. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "and" in the twenty-sixth line down to the word "hereby" in the twenty-seventh line, in the following words, "that the executive and military authorities of the United States are," and to insert the words "he is," so that it will read "and he is hereby directed to retaliate," &c. The effect will be to get rid of the word "that," which has no business there anyhow, and to direct the President to retaliate instead of "executive and military authorities of the United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, there being, on a division—ayes twenty-three, noes not counted.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, as amended.

MR. SUMNER. I will simply suggest a verbal amendment to the substitute, instead of the words "in conformity with" the phrase "according to," that being the phrase employed in the statute of 1813. It reads better, and it is in conformity with the precedent. I merely suggest it. There is no difference in the effect.

MR. WADE. The Senator is not acting according to the precedent he quotes. That law directed the President to make "full and ample retaliation." Those words are two strong for the Senator's nerves altogether, and he has skipped them over.

MR. SUMNER. I propose to substitute "according to" for "in conformity with" merely to bring the language into conformity with the precedent, and to make it read a little smoother.

MR. HALE. I should like to hear some philologist give us the difference in meaning between the resolution if amended as the Senator proposes, and as it now stands. I am not in favor of making amendments unless there is something to be effected by them. If it is a mere matter of rhetoric, I think it sounds as well now as it will if you alter it.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio as amended.

MR. DOOLITTLE. I desire to inquire for information whether the last sentence, beginning with the word "Congress," in the thirtieth line, is now in the resolution?

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in the amendment. When the amendment shall have been disposed of that clause will be open to amendment.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

MR. SUMNER. I now move what I suppose the Senator from Maryland had intended to move, but his motion was not in order when he made it, and indeed I think it would require that he should go a little further than he proposed to go in order to carry out his own idea. I had intended to move it originally, but it was not in order when I made the other motion. It is to strike out all after the word "soldiers" in the thirtieth line on the 3d page, in these words:

Congress do not, however, intend by this resolution to limit or restrict the power of the President to the modes or principles of retaliation herein mentioned, but only to advise resort to them as demanded by the occasion.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to state that there is another amendment pending before the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts or the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland will be in order. It is the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] to add the words "and require" in line thirty-three, after the word "advise." That is the amendment now pending.

MR. LANE, of Kansas. Is it in order to move that the Senate do now adjourn?

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

MR. LANE, of Kansas. I make that motion. Several Senators. Oh, no; let us dispose of this subject.

The motion was not agreed to.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, to insert the words "and require" after the word "advise," in the thirty-third line.

The amendment was agreed to.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is now in order.

MR. SUMNER. It is simply to strike out the last passage, beginning with the word "Congress:"

Congress do not, however, intend by this resolution to limit or restrict the power of the President to the modes or principles of retaliation herein mentioned, &c.

MR. SHERMAN. Before that motion is put, I desire to submit a motion, if it is in order, which I think will better attain the object desired. I think that last clause ought to be retained, with the exception of the words "to the modes or principles of retaliation herein mentioned." Those words ought to be struck out, being inconsistent, and then it would read:

Congress do not intend, however, by this resolution to limit or restrict the power of the President, but only to advise and require a resort to retaliation as demanded by the occasion.

MR. SUMNER. That is right; I accept that in lieu of the amendment I proposed.

MR. HOWARD. There is no objection to that.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio proposes to amend the resolution by striking out, in line thirty-two, after the word "President," the words "to the modes or principles of retaliation herein mentioned;" and in line thirty-four, to strike out the word "them," and insert the word "retaliation;" so that, as amended, the clause will read:

Congress do not intend, however, by this resolution to limit or restrict the power of the President, but only to advise and require a resort to retaliation as demanded by the occasion.

MR. WADE. I do not know how far that amendment might change the principle of the resolution. It uses the words "to limit or restrict the power of the President," but it does not say to what modes. It does not restrict him at all. I do not know that it hurts it, however, and I shall not object to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

MR. HENDRICKS. I desire to offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further resolved, That in the judgment of Congress such measures ought to be taken as may be necessary to secure the earliest exchange of prisoners at all times during the continuance of the war.

MR. HOWARD. It seems to me there is a very plain distinction between the two things, the mere treatment of our prisoners in the hands of the enemy, and the exchange of them in the regular pursuance of a cartel. I see, therefore, no necessity for burdening this simple resolution of retaliation with any recommendation whatever upon the subject of exchange. Believing as I do that the Executive of the United States and the military authorities have been diligent and faithful in their endeavors to bring about an exchange of prisoners, I do not feel authorized upon this occasion to insert in this resolution a censure of the President and the military authorities by implication such as it seems to me would arise from the use of such language. I therefore am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana. If it shall appear hereafter that the Government is derelict in regard to the exchange of prisoners, that it is inattentive to our interests or the interests of the prisoners, I will with pleasure join the honorable Senator in resorting to measures which shall be effective; but I do not see the propriety of incorporating this clause in this resolution, and therefore oppose it.

MR. HENDRICKS. I intended to offer, as I said to the Senate a while ago, a substitute for the entire resolution, this being a part of it; but as the resolution introduced by the Senator from Michigan has been so amended as that I have no objection to it, I offer this as an additional section. It presents this simple question, whether Senators are in favor of an exchange of our prisoners. I am not going into a discussion now as to whether the Administration has done its duty on this subject. This is no criticism upon the Administration. The first resolution as now adopted by the Senate is mandatory. This is but an expression of the judgment of Congress that that policy ought to be adopted which will secure an early exchange of prisoners during the continuance of the war.

For myself, I am not satisfied that justice has been done to the soldiers on this subject of exchange. As I said the other day, a distinguished member of the House of Representatives, of the Senator's own political party, brought it as a grave charge against the War Department that these exchanges might have been made months ago, but that thousands of our soldiers had been left to die because that duty was not done by the War Department. The Senator from Ohio, at the head of the committee on the conduct of the war, who is presumed to be well informed on the subject, in the debate the other day, said that he could not understand why exchanges were not made. I do not desire to say in this resolution that the Administration is in fault; but upon so grave and important a question as this, one affecting so seriously the comfort of the soldiers and the happiness of their friends at home, is it not proper for Congress to express an opinion? I dare say that opinion will be respected by the Administration after it is expressed. The simple question is, whether Congress is in favor of an early exchange of prisoners. It mitigates the sufferings and the barbarities of war; it is a proper thing; and it is a subject upon which it is proper for Congress to express an opinion; and it cannot be said to be a criticism upon the Administration.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. As the resolution has now been amended, it covers all the points covered by the amendment that I offered in the early part of this discussion except one, and that is, that the President be requested to procure an amendment of the existing cartel by which commissaries of prisoners may be authorized to visit our prisoners in the hands of the rebels, to promote their comfort, examine into their condition, and make such suggestions to him as may be deemed necessary to enforce humane treatment by the insurgents.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator offer that as a separate resolution?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir; I move to amend the resolution by adding the following as an additional section:

And he it further resolved, That the President be requested to procure an amendment to the existing cartel by which commissaries of prisoners may be authorized to visit our prisoners in the hands of the rebels, to promote their comfort, examine into their condition, and to make such suggestions to him as may be deemed necessary to enforce humane treatment by the insurgents.

Mr. WADE. I hope that will not be adopted. There is no necessity whatever for it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I cannot for my life see what objection there can be to a proposition of this sort. We are here instructing the President to retaliate under certain circumstances. As I stated the other day—and I read from the books to establish the position—it has been common for the last two hundred years to have these commissaries of prisoners in the enemy's country. During the war between us and Great Britain, in 1812, 1813, and 1814, we had a commissary of prisoners at Halifax looking after the condition of our prisoners and making suggestions in regard to their comfort.

Our object, as I understand it, is to make the rebels treat our prisoners properly. Suppose they insist that they will not exchange, I want to know what their treatment is in order that the President may be advised in regard to this matter. How is it possible for the President to know how to retaliate unless he has men to look into the condition of the prisoners and report the facts to him? There can be no objection in the world to a proposition of this sort. It is not treating with the rebels. I will not disagree with the Senator from Ohio on that point. I do not want to treat with Jefferson Davis. This is not treating for peace. The proposition is to procure an amendment to the existing cartel. If this requires treating with the rebels, we have treated with them, because we have a cartel on the subject of the exchange of prisoners. Why not in the name of sense provide in some way that men may go there and look after our prisoners?

Mr. WADE. I wish to know if we have not just such a thing now. Are not our commissaries there now under the cartel as it exists, carrying provisions and clothing to our prisoners? They do not always get them, as the proof shows; but have we not men there?

Mr. HENDERSON. If that be the case, why is it that the President the other day released some men in order to act as commissaries for their prisoners, and why is it that they released some of our men to act as commissaries for our prisoners? It strikes me as being the most remarkable thing on the face of the earth that there should be any objection to this proposition of mine. I do not want you to treat with rebels; I am not asking for anything of that sort. I am not asking now that we treat with them about terms of peace. This is an entirely different thing. Humanity requires that we look to the condition of our soldiers in the hands of the rebels; all the principles of civilized society demand that we should do something to ameliorate the condition of our prisoners in their hands. There is a vast number of them there. Some difficulty has taken place in relation to the exchange. In the name of sense is there anything objectionable in having men to go there to look into the condition of our prisoners, not to get upon their knees and beg of Jefferson Davis, but to demand as a right in the name of civilization, that our prisoners shall be properly treated. We have a right to demand it. The laws of nations guaranty it to civilized people. I hope, therefore, the amendment will be adopted. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there any difficulty in that matter now? May not the President send such commissioners now? I think we ought not to belittle so grave a resolution as one in favor of retaliation—always a grave measure—by coupling with it any subordinate matter of this kind. It can be done by the President under the existing laws.

Mr. McDUGALL. The remark of the Senator from Ohio will apply to the whole proposition as now amended on the motion of his colleague, because the resolution as amended recognizes the whole matter as being within the province of the Executive, and is merely advisory to the Executive as to how he shall discharge his particular office, and this again is a matter of advice. That being conceded, we have been for a week talking about a thing that does not belong to the province of the Senate or House of Representatives, but belongs to the province of the Executive, and undertaking to give advice to the President of the United States, who has charge of this business, and whose particular duty it is to see that he understands it, and that he executes his office in a proper manner. I think we have exhausted all these days uselessly and fruitlessly and out of our own province. I think gentlemen have sought this as an opportunity to say things that may be put in print, and that may be read on the stump some day hereafter when they may have occasion again to seek the force of popular opinion.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do honestly believe today that if we adopt this amendment we shall have no more rebel atrocities on our prisoners. Whenever they find out that we have officers there to look after the condition of our prisoners and to report the facts to the country and to the civilized world, we shall have no more of this barbarous conduct toward our prisoners.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Riddle, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Farwell, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Grimes, Harding, Hicks, Richardson, Saulsbury, and Sprague—9.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] to the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. SUMNER.]

Mr. SUMNER. With the permission of my colleague, I propose to withdraw my amendment, and in withdrawing it I wish to state that I do so because the resolution on which the Senate is now acting has undergone such modification as to be in substantial harmony with the proposition which I originally introduced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. SUMNER. There is a verbal amendment which, if I can have the attention of my friend from Ohio, I wish to suggest, and that is, to strike out the word "insurgents" in the sixth line and substitute "rebels." In speaking of them here on this floor, we do not speak of them as insurgents; we speak of them as rebels, and I wish so to speak of them in this resolution. I hope my friend from Ohio will accept the amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator is against it, I shall not press it.

Mr. HOWARD. I am against it most decidedly.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. McDUGALL. I wish to say a word before the final vote is taken, that I may be well understood. There is nothing in the substance of this resolution now that I deem at all exceptionable as far as the matter itself is concerned, and I should not object to it if we were called upon to counsel the executive department of the Government, but I vote against this proposition upon the ground that it has no business either in this Hall or in the other Hall of Congress, but belongs to a department of the Government which has full authority over it, and which has not sought our advice in regard to it, and is not likely to accept that advice unless it pleases. We have spent one full week in fruitless conversation.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 31, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MAINTENANCE OF THE UNION.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the duty of the President to maintain, in every constitutional and legal manner, the integrity of the American Union as formed by the fathers of the Republic, and in no event, and under no circumstances, to proffer or accept negotiations which shall admit by the remotest implication the existence of any other Federal or Confederate Government within the territory of the United States.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to know whether it is in order to move a suspension of the rules in order to offer this resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is not. That motion can only be made on Monday after the morning hour.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Then I give notice that at the earliest opportunity, on next Monday, I shall move to suspend the rules for the purpose of offering this resolution.

RAILROAD TO NEW YORK.

Mr. WEBSTER. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill to provide for the construction of a line of railway communication between the cities of Washington and New York, and to constitute the same a public highway and a military road and postal route of the United States, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was entered.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, announced that the President had this day approved and signed a joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 94) for the relief of Isaac R. Diller;

An act (H. R. No. 344) for the relief of Mary Scales Accardi;

An act (H. R. No. 622) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia," approved July 1, 1864; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 99) relieving mineral lands from the operation of all acts passed at the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress granting lands or extending the term of former grants.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. R. No. 106) providing for the compilation of a congressional Directory at each session; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, by unanimous consent, introduced joint resolutions of the Legislature of Maine, in favor of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting slavery; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

TAX ON SALES.

Mr. F. CLARKE. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That in order that the Government may have, and the people understand, its fixed and determined policy in reference to restoring the currency of the country to its normal value, the Committee on Ways and Means are hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of imposing a special tax of one per cent. on all sales of the country for the period of one year, and a tax of three fourths of one per cent. for one year thereafter, and a tax of one half of one per cent. thereafter, until the whole sum collected equals in amount the United States notes now issued by the Government; and that the proceeds of the tax, as it may from time to time be collected, be especially appropriated to the redemption of said notes until all are redeemed and canceled. And also that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized, at any time after the close of the war, to issue bonds not having less than five nor more than forty years to run, to an amount equal to all of the Treasury interest-bearing legal-tender notes that have been or may hereafter be issued, and dispose of the same from time to time as may be required to pay said notes as they mature from and after the close and termination of the rebellion, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. STEVENS. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

Mr. ANCONA. I ask my colleague to give way until I introduce a resolution for reference.

Mr. STEVENS. I call for the regular order of business, and will yield for no purpose.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

The SPEAKER stated the question in order to be the consideration of the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House, on the 14th of last June, rejected Senate joint resolution No. 16, submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States; and that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. ASHLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McALLISTER] to have read a brief statement.

Mr. McALLISTER sent to the Clerk's desk and had read the following:

When this subject was before this House on a former occasion I voted against the measure. I have been in favor of exhausting all means of conciliation to restore the Union as our fathers made it. I am for the whole Union, and utterly opposed to secession or dissolution in any shape. The result of all the peace missions, and especially that of Mr. Blair, has satisfied me that nothing short of the recognition of their independence will satisfy the southern confederacy. It must therefore be destroyed; and in voting for the present measure I cast my vote against the corner-stone of the southern confederacy, and declare eternal war against the enemies of my country.

[Applause from the Republican side of the House.]

Mr. ASHLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COFFROTH.]

Mr. COFFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I speak not to-day for or against slavery. I am content that this much-agitated question shall be adjudicated at the proper time by the people. It is my purpose to state in all candor the reasons which prompt me to give the vote I shall soon record.

The amending of our Constitution is fraught with so much importance to the American people that before it is accomplished the amendments proposed should be scrutinized with the strictest criticism. No frivolous, vague, or uncertain experiment should be for a moment tolerated. The life and existence of this nation is centered in the observance and faithful execution of the powers conferred by the Constitution upon the servants of the people.

The joint resolution before us proposes:

That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution, namely:

ART. XIII, SEC. 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The first inquiry is, has Congress this power? I turn to the Constitution, and find article fifth provides—

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress."

It is not claimed that Congress itself can engraft this amendment into the Constitution without being ratified by three fourths of the States. Then, sir, under the Constitution, Congress has no power beyond discriminating what shall or ought to be submitted to the people. The members of this House assume no responsibility, they enact no amendment, but as faithful Representatives they submit to the people, the source from whence their power comes, the proposed amendment. "Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just power from the consent of the governed." All political power is invested in the people. At their will constitutions can be remodeled and laws repealed.

The amending of our Constitution is no new experiment. Already at three different times amendments have been submitted to the Legislatures, and by them adopted. The first amendment was ratified in 1791, the second in 1798, and the third in 1804. It never was intended by the wise men who adopted the Constitution that it should remain unchanged. The growth of the nation, its progress and its advancement, will, as time passes, demand new articles and additional provisions. The people are the guardians of the Constitution, and I am not convinced that any danger is to be anticipated, as presented in the following illustrations of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] put with such admirable compactness and scholastic force:

1. "I assert that there is another limitation, stronger even than the letter of the Constitution, and that is to be found in its intent and spirit and its foundation idea. I put the question which has been put before in this debate, can three fourths of the States constitutionally change this Government, and make it an autocracy? It is not prohibited by the Constitution."

2. "Can three fourths of the States make an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which shall prohibit the State of Ohio from having two Houses in its Legislative Assembly? It is not prohibited in the Constitution."

3. "Sir, can three fourths of the States provide an amendment to the Constitution by which one fourth should bear all the taxes of this Government? It is not prohibited."

4. "Can three fourths of the States, by an amendment to the Constitution, subvert the State governments of one fourth and divide their territory among the rest? It is not forbidden."

5. "Can three fourths of the States so amend the Constitution of the States as to make the northern States of this Union slaveholding States?"

I do not think there is any power in the Constitution which would permit three fourths of the States to change the form of government. The Constitution provides for a republican form of government, and to establish an autocracy would not be amending the Constitution, but utterly destroying it, and establishing upon its ruins a new form of government of self-derived power.

I would not give one of the new copper two-cent pieces for the insertion into the Constitution of explicit prohibitions against every other supposition brought forward by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON:]

"Long before three fourths of the States can become so debauched and demoralized that they would practice such monstrous injustice, they must have lost the sense of honor that would be bound by a compact, and the fear of God that would keep an oath. When these virtues have died out, no matter what safeguards a written constitution might contain, they would be of no more value than so much waste paper. There are certain things which can never be attempted so long as there is public virtue enough not to evade, explain away, or openly violate the Constitution. It is for this reason so little limitation was put upon the amending power.

"The actual limitations on that power operated against natural equity, and hence the necessity for their insertion. One of them restrained Congress from putting an end to the slave trade prior to 1808, and the practical effect of the other is to give New England, which has a smaller population than New York and only a fraction more than Pennsylvania, twelve Senators, while New York and Pennsylvania have each only two. The Constitution presumes that the majority of the people in three fourths of the States cannot be corrupted; or that, if they should, they would not afterward respect paper restraints on their passions. A constitution is no stronger than the sense of the moral obligation of the parties bound by it. It is futile to take men's engagements against crimes more heinous than breaking an engagement. You might as well swear a man not to commit highway robbery. If he has conscience enough to respect an oath, it would be needless, and if he has not, an idle precaution."

Again, it is argued that this amendment is unconstitutional; that the Congress of the United States has no legal authority to propose this amendment, nor have the States in ratifying it the constitutional power to destroy or interfere with the right of property. Learned gentlemen of this House differ on this subject. The Constitution itself provides the remedy by which all these differences of opinion can be legally adjudicated. Section two of article three provides:

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution."

In my opinion, if any person is injured by this amendment, he has a judicial remedy before the highest court of the country.

If the States of the South desire to retain slavery, they can do so by refusing to ratify this amendment. There are thirty-five States. In order to adopt this amendment twenty-seven States must ratify it. Eleven States have seceded from the Union. This is more than is required to defeat the amendment. Certainly no one will pretend to argue that this amendment can be adopted without being submitted to the eleven seceded States. If it was, these States would not be considered a part of the Union. In fact it would be, to all intent and purpose, recognizing them as independent States, and not being under the control of the Federal Constitution.

If this view is taken, then this amendment can do no harm to the people of the States in the Union. In June last my objection to this amendment was that it was taking away the property of the people of the States that remained true to the Union; that the Constitution was made the means to oppress rather than protect the people. Since that time Missouri and Maryland have abolished slavery by their own action, and the Governor of Kentucky in his message recommends to the Legislature of that State gradual emancipation. The same objection which was then urged against this amendment cannot now be urged.

It is argued that new State governments will be formed in the seceded States under the control of military governors, and this amendment ratified by them. Whether this amendment would be binding upon the people of the seceded States thus ratified will depend entirely upon the result of this war. If after a long struggle, and each of the contending armies or Powers will conclude to adopt the wise and humane policy of a peaceful solution of the difficulties now existing, all of the acts of the State governments formed by military power will be invalid, and the old organization of these States recognized. In this event the ratifications by the new-made State governments will not be worth the paper upon which they are written. If the South achieve her independence, then this amendment will only apply to that which does not exist. If the people of the South are subjugated and their State lines obliterated, and they are ever admitted into this Union under new constitutions, each and every one of the constitutions will have to come free from slavery before the State will be admitted.

The South would not remain in the Union under the Constitution as it now is; they demanded stronger guarantees for their institution of slavery. Can any intelligent person believe that after fighting as they have for nearly four years they will accept that which they rejected before the war? If they will not come back under the Constitution, why not abolish slavery; strike from our statute-books every enactment which protects it; make our Constitution and our laws free from the subject of slavery? And then, when this unfortunate, inhuman, barbarous, and bloody war has been prolonged until every heart shall turn sick with its carnage and the reports of its wrongs and outrages, and the people demand a cessation of hostilities until it be ascertained if glorious peace cannot be accomplished by compromise and concession, there will be no obstacles in the Constitution to defeat the accomplishing of a much desired result. We will be free to give new guarantees or new amendments to protect the rights and property of every person who shelters himself under the American Constitution.

Again, I have voted for every peace resolution offered in this House. My heart yearns for peace. The gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber refused to appoint peace commissioners, but they tell us this amendment will do more to secure peace than any resolution proposed in this House. Although they would not try the remedy we presented, I am willing to try the one they present; and if by my vote this amendment is submitted to the States, and it brings this war to a close, I will ever rejoice at the vote I have given; but if I am mistaken, I will remember it is not the first time.

Mr. Speaker, I desire above all things that the Democratic party be again placed in power. The condition of the country needs the wise counsel of the Democracy. The peace and prosperity of this once powerful and happy nation require it to be placed under Democratic rule. The history of the past demonstrates this. The question of slavery has been a fruitful theme for the opponents of the Democracy. It has breathed into existence fanaticism, and feeds it with such meat as to make it ponderous in growth. It must soon be strangled or the nation is lost. I propose to do this by removing from the political arena that which has given it life and strength. As soon as this is done fanaticism

"Writhes with pain,
And dies among its worshippers."

Then the rays of truth will be unshaded, and once more our people will rejoice in the salvation of their country, and of the reinstating in power that party which made this country great, and which has done so much to secure to man civil and religious liberty.

Many of the honorable gentlemen of this House with whom I am politically associated may condemn me for my action to-day. I assure them I do that only which my conscience sanctions and my sense of duty to my country demands. I have been a Democrat all the days of my life. I learned my Democracy from that being who gave me birth; it was pure; it came from one who never told me an untruth. All my political life has been spent in defending and supporting the measures which I thought were for the good of the party and the country. My energy, my means, and my time were all given for the success of the Democratic cause. I am no Democrat by mere profession, but I have always been a working one. If by my action to-day I dig my political grave, I will descend into it without a murmur, knowing that I am justified in my action by a conscientious belief I am doing what will ultimately prove to be a service to my country, and knowing there is one dear, devoted, and loved being in this wide world who will not bring tears of bitterness to that grave, but will strew it with beautiful flowers, for it returns me to that domestic circle from whence I have been taken for the greater part of the last two years.

Knowing my duty I intend to perform it, relying upon the intelligence and honesty of the people I represent to do me justice. If this action shall be condemned by my people I will go back with pleasure to the enjoyment of private life, free from the exciting political arena; but no power on earth will prevent me from quietly depositing my ballot in behalf of the candidates of the Democratic party. I hope I will be granted the pleasure of reading the eloquent speeches made by my Democratic associates, and admire their rise and onward march to distinction. This boon I pray you not to take from me.

If, on the other hand, the course of the Democrats who will vote for this amendment will meet the approbation of the people, and we are greeted with the plaudit of "Well done, good and faithful servants," it will be the desire of our hearts to open our arms for your reception and shelter you as the hen shelters her brood, satisfied you were honest in your belief but mistaken in your opinions.

Mr. ASHLEY. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HERRICK.]

Mr. HARDING. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this is rather an arbitrary proceeding. One gentleman occupies the floor and farms it out to whoever he pleases. We have a Presiding Officer, and I prefer he shall assign the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule on the subject.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"While a member is occupying the floor he may yield it to another, or explanation of the pending measure as well as for personal explanation."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Can these be called explanations relative to members?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that these are explanations of the pending measure.

Mr. ASHLEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I ask for five minutes of the time of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HERRICK. I have no objection to give the gentleman five minutes of my time.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that I would be permitted to close my short career upon this floor without claiming any of the time or attention of the House; but I feel that I owe it to more than two hundred and sixty thousand lovers of the country, friends of the "Constitution as it is," in the State of Pennsylvania, to repudiate the sentiments and position of gentlemen, [Messrs. McALLISTER and COFFROTH,] my colleagues here, who have been heard this morning.

I came here, sir, with no ambition save to do what I conceived to be my duty in the service of my constituents and the preservation of a pure and consistent record.

But I prefer to go back to my home, I choose to meet those who sent me here, and say that I have tried to do that, at least, which was exacted of me when I took the oath entitling me to a seat upon this floor, that I would, to the extent of my ability, preserve inviolate the Constitution of the United States, in word and letter, as those who made it gave it to us. I feel that I have not been derelict in the discharge of duty; that I have not forgotten what was due to myself and what was due to them. I have no argument to make in regard to what I conceive to be the merits of the question before us. That ground has been fully and ably covered by those who have preceded me. I stand here to-day to indorse the sentiments and arguments of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] I stand with him as to the power of this House to pass this measure. His able and eloquent arguments have not been answered—nor, in my judgment, can they be—by the ablest of those on the other side of the House.

Now, sir, it strikes me that much as this matter has been discussed, no member has yet satisfactorily met the great question at the bottom of this proposition. Abolish slavery, and no man among them has pretended to show what we are to do with the freedmen, except that, as good Christians, it will become our duty to feed and clothe them. The true philanthropists and tax payers of the country are equally interested in knowing what is to be done with the elephant when we get him. We should not pull down the old house until we have built the new one. I say to my friends on the other side of the House that for them to discuss the constitutionality of a proposed amendment is a broad farce. They propose to amend that, the body of which, in every essential, vital feature they have consistently violated in the action of the President of the United States, this House, and every subordinate department and employé known to this Administration. It would have been more creditable to the fairness of the dominant party if they had proposed to blot out the sovereignty of the States, and declared that there are no reserved rights in the Constitution which Congress and the President cannot ignore with impunity.

If, Mr. Speaker, I could be induced to vote for any amendatory proposition to the organic law of this land I would not do it at a time like this, when all is chaos.

The SPEAKER. The five minutes allotted to the gentleman have expired.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I rose simply for the purpose of repudiating the sentiments and the positions assumed upon this floor by two of my colleagues from Pennsylvania, and have only to request my colleague [Mr. COFFROTH] to make his acknowledgments to my other venerable colleague [Mr. BAILY] to whose Quaker knocks he is doubtless indebted for his wonderful conversion.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Speaker, the joint resolution now before the House submitting to the Legislatures of the several States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, comes before us under circumstances widely different from those existing when at the last session of Congress the same resolution failed to receive the requisite two-thirds vote of this body.

The eventful year which has elapsed has wrought great changes in the situation of the country affecting this important question, and I approach its discussion at this time with quite altered views, as to its expediency, from those which governed me when I last addressed the House upon the same subject. The brilliant successes that have rewarded the gallant efforts of the military and naval forces of the nation, and the result of the presidential election, which has since transpired, have necessarily exercised an important influence over the public mind in both the loyal and the insurgent States; and this question has assumed a very different aspect from that which it bore at the last session of Congress. The rejection by the people at the polls of the proclaimed policy of the Democratic party has closed many avenues to reconciliation which then remained open, and the waning strength of the rebellion has brought its leaders to the verge of desperation. Perils which then seemed imminent have faded away, and others of quite different tenor menace us in the future.

In such a period of transition, when tremendous events succeed one another with almost inconceivable rapidity, it is impossible for the legislator to remain unaffected by the mighty changes that meet him on every side. It is weak, Mr. Speaker, it is criminal for him, from a false pride in preserving an imaginary consistency, to remain stationary when all the rest of the world is moving forward, and to regulate his words and actions by what he has said or done in the past. Change is the universal law of nature, pervading the world of mind as well as the world of matter. Ordinarily it effects its operation by almost imperceptible gradations, and their results only become visible at long intervals. But every generation sees further and more clearly than its predecessor that the radicalism of one century becomes the conservatism of the next, while steadily through the ages the eternal march of human advancement sweeps on. In such a period, however, as that in which our lot is cast, and in such a crisis as that now resting upon the country, when the whole fabric of society is convulsed by the fierce struggle between contending opinions, upon the issue of which depends the continued existence of the American Republic, if not, indeed, the fate of constitutional liberty throughout the world, this progress goes on with marvelous celerity, and the changes of a century are sometimes condensed into a single year.

Mr. Speaker, at the last session of Congress I voted against this resolution from a solemn conviction of duty. And as I shall now vote for it from a similar conviction, it becomes me to explain to the House and the country what considerations prompt me to assume a new attitude upon the question before us. Events which will now govern my action have superseded the arguments which influenced the vote I recorded last year. The considerations which then rendered the amendment proposed impolitic, in my view, have ceased to operate, and reasons of great force, which were not then in existence, have arisen to make it now expedient, and to warrant me in reversing my former action.

In my humble judgment the rejection of this measure at that time was demanded by the best interests of the country, which now, on the contrary, seem to call for its adoption. Mr. Speaker, circumstances have changed, and I shall now vote for the resolution, as I formerly voted against it, because I think such action on my part is best calculated to assist in the maintenance of the Government, the preservation of the Union, and the perpetuation of the free institutions which we inherited from our fathers. These are the great objects for which the loyal people of this country have struggled during the last four years with a courage and self-devotion to which history affords no parallel, and poured forth their blood and treasure with an unhesitating patriotism that has astonished the world. So long as a Representative seeks these objects, regardless of partisan or political prejudices, he cannot be rightfully charged with inconsistency, no matter how widely the means he may find it necessary to employ at one time or another, to adapt himself to ever-varying circumstances, may differ. I believe this is the only consistency that is truly desirable. It is certainly the only one to which I make any pretensions.

I have no doubt of the power to make this amendment to the Constitution in the manner proposed. It is altogether immaterial, for the purposes of this discussion, whether the power of three fourths of the States to alter the organic law is altogether unlimited, except by the reservation in the amending clause of the Constitution. It may well be doubted whether the people do not possess certain inalienable rights, of which a minority, however small, cannot be divested by a majority, however large. But the States formed the Federal Government by a grant to it of their sovereignty over certain specified subjects, and it must seem to follow that they can also confer upon it any other rights or powers which they themselves possess, in the manner prescribed by the Constitution itself. By the adoption of that Constitution the States transferred to three fourths of their number their entire sovereignty, which can be at any time exerted to augment or diminish the functions of the General Government, save in the two particulars excepted by special limitation. Three fourths of the States can, by an amendment of the Constitution, exercise throughout the United States any power that a State individually can exercise within its own limits.

The institution of slavery is purely a creation of law, and completely under the control of the State in which it may exist, at whose pleasure it may be modified or abolished. What the State may do, the higher power to which by the adoption of the Constitution the State voluntarily ceded its whole sovereignty, except in two particulars, is certainly competent to do, whenever it chooses to assert its authority. In amending the Constitution, three fourths of the States actually represent the whole; and the agent is invested with all the powers that belong to his principal.

That this was the view entertained by the founders of our Government is conclusively established by the fact that a proviso, declaring that "no State shall, without its consent, be affected in its internal policy," was defeated in the Convention which framed the Constitution by a decisive majority. The power thus acknowledged was never disputed from that day until the abolition of slavery by a constitutional amendment became a practical question in the politics of the country. I have never entertained a doubt of the existence of this power, and I am now convinced that the time has arrived when it is expedient to exercise it in consummating the amendment proposed in the resolution now under consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I never had any love for the institution of slavery. I always regarded it as a moral, social, and political evil, and a fruitful curse to any community in which it might exist. In this sentiment I believe that I fairly represent the views of the great bulk of the Democratic party of the northern States. That party has never been either pro-slavery or anti-slavery; but it has ever been devoted to the Union and the Constitution, and always consistent in the position that the Federal Government had no right to interfere either for or against the institution, except to fulfill the duty in regard to the return of fugitive slaves imposed upon it by the Constitution. Democrats of the school in which I was educated believed, and believe now, that under the Constitution as it exists, every State has the exclusive control of the subject within its limits, and that the Federal power can neither abolish it in a State nor prohibit it in a Territory. The contrary doctrine we regard as repugnant to the very theory of the Government and inimical to its peace and safety; and Democratic statesmen clearly foresaw and predicted that the ascendancy of an anti-slavery party in the North and in the Government would provoke an armed collision between the northern and southern States of the Union. The Democracy cared nothing for slavery. Its preservation or destruction was with them a subordinate consideration in comparison with the stability of the Government, the supremacy of the Constitution, and the integrity of the Union; and they accordingly exerted their utmost power to keep the irritating subject out of party politics, and thus to avoid the terrible catastrophe which its agitation has brought upon the country. As a party they did all they could to prevent the war in which we are now engaged, and no portion of the responsibility for it rests upon the shoulders of the northern Democracy. They warmly supported the "Crittenden compromise," and were perfectly willing to give to the South any additional constitutional guarantees that might be requisite for the future security of their "peculiar institution."

For the sake of the Union the Democratic party of the North would have cheerfully acquiesced in amendments to the Constitution explicitly acknowledging the right of citizens of the slaveholding States to carry their slaves into the Territories and hold them there until the new States, upon their admission to the Union, should declare for themselves whether they would have the institution or not. For the sake of peace and the Union they would gladly have voted for the then proposed amendment providing that the Constitution should never be changed so as to destroy or weaken slavery in the States where it then existed. Had their views prevailed, and governed the action of the Administration, all the blood that has been shed and all the money that has been expended, North and South, during the last four years, would have been saved, and the country would have gone on uninterruptedly in her marvelous career of prosperity and power. But the voice of Democratic wisdom was disregarded; men of extreme opinions controlled both sections, and a civil war ensued, of which the end is not yet—the South fighting for secession, and consequently the perpetuation of slavery, and the North for the Union, and incidentally for the abolition of slavery.

The Democratic party, while sustaining the Government, believed that the interests of the country, of humanity, and of the cause of liberty would be best consulted in a peace, in which both parties must give up something for the sake of agreement. They believed that there was no impassable gulf between the North and the South which should prevent them from coming together again under the same Government, and that the issue of slavery might be of the greatest importance in any negotiation which might be undertaken to restore peace and reestablish a perfect Union. They thought that both of the combatants, weary of the carnage and devastation that were desolating the land, and taught by dearly-bought experience to respect the bravery and determination of each other, would gladly consent to a peace upon the basis of mutual concession—the South surrendering its project of a separate nationality and the North its hostility to the institution of negro slavery.

These were the views which prevailed in the Democratic party a year ago, and made it then practically a unit in opposition to the measure now before the House proposing the abolition of slavery by an amendment of the Constitution, in accordance with its own provisions. As a lifelong member of that time-honored political organization, whose history is the history of the Government in its proudest days, and whose policy, carried out by a long line of wise and patriotic statesmen, made this country what it was four years ago, I raised my voice and recorded my vote as a member of this House against the joint resolution now under consideration.

The tone of the public mind at that time seemed to me, as it no doubt seemed to all who agreed in opinion with me, to foreshadow a change of Administration and the accession to power of the Democratic party, which we believed would be able to check the red tide of war and induce the South to return to the Union, by showing a conciliatory spirit and giving it the fullest assurance that all its rights and privileges under the Constitution, as it exists, should be preserved, and their continued enjoyment of them for the future guaranteed by such constitutional changes as might be requisite to effect that object. The two parties into which the people were divided prepared for the presidential election with a distinctly understood issue. The party of the Administration incorporated this amendment in the platform of principles upon which they entered the canvass. The Opposition boldly declared for a cessation of hostilities and a national convention to redress all grievances, settle all difficulties, and make an honorable and lasting peace by a satisfactory compromise. It was well understood that the principal business of this contemplated national convention, should it ever assemble, would be to put at rest, at once and forever, by the agency of amendments to the Constitution, the vexed question of slavery, which has disturbed the harmony of the country ever since its agitation was commenced, when Missouri applied for admission into the Union. There was therefore no conflict of opinion between the two parties as to the power to amend the Constitution in regard to the institution of slavery. Stripped of all side issues the main question presented to the people for their decision was whether slavery should be abolished and the seceded States coerced into allegiance to the Constitution, as it is now proposed to amend it, or whether the war should be speedily terminated and the agis of the Constitution thrown around the social system of the South. The people by a large majority sustained the first proposition and fully indorsed the policy of the Administration on the slavery issue, and I am now disposed to bow in submission to that popular decree.

I have no doubt, however, that if the popular verdict upon this momentous question had been different from what it was, we should now be in sight of the blessed haven of peace, for I am fully persuaded that the olive-branch held out in the election of the distinguished and patriotic citizen and soldier who was nominated at Chicago, and the indorsement by the northern people of the principles enunciated by the Democratic party, would have been hailed with joy by our fellow-countrymen of the South as the harbinger of an honorable and a lasting peace. The ablest men of the whole country would have come together in a spirit of mutual concession and compromise and resettled the foundations of the Government so firmly that the superstructure might defy the wind and the storm for ages yet unborn.

But this was not to be. The anti-slavery sentiment proved predominant. The candidates of the Democratic party for President and Vice President were defeated, and a Congress elected which is certain to adopt the resolution now under consideration unless we anticipate their action. The question is settled by a popular verdict, which I am not disposed to further resist. So far as the national Government is concerned, slavery is no longer a political issue. We cannot influence its fate, which now depends upon the action of the States in their individual capacity. And released from all party ties which formerly bound them to it, but which now belong to a past state of things, the Representatives of the Democratic party in this House are left free to act upon the question pending as in their estimation, individually, will best promote the restoration of the Union, and preserve our free Government. For my part, I shall vote for the resolution, because, under existing circumstances, I think its immediate adoption will in a great degree tend to secure those objects nearer than all others to every patriotic heart.

Now, and for the next two years at least, the Democratic party is, and must be, powerless in the nation. It may embarrass, but it cannot change, the policy of the Administration. For good or for evil, the Administration now in power will wield the functions and control the destinies of the Government. It may end the war and restore the Union. At all events its opponents cannot. Such being the case, I am unable to reconcile it to my ideas of duty to stand between it and the people. The Administration desires now to submit this amendment to the States, and, in my judgment, a Democrat may consent to this submission simply from a desire to allow its policy a fair opportunity with the people, while holding himself at perfect liberty to advocate or oppose the amendment in his own State, as circumstances may seem to require. Sir, if this were an absolute enactment to abolish slavery by legislation, in defiance of the constitutional provision that the States shall have exclusive control of their local institutions, a widely different question would be presented from that which is involved in the measure now pending. As, however, it is but a preliminary measure to enable the people to practically reach and legally pass judgment upon an important issue which has agitated the country ever since the formation of the Union, I am unable to discover any violation of the great principles of the political party with which I have been identified through all my past life, in recording my vote in favor of its passage. I am willing to accord to my constituents the privilege I enjoy, as their Representative, of personally passing upon this measure. It may be, sir, that the adoption of this resolution, at this particular time, will be productive of beneficial results to the national cause, while it can certainly do no harm, since, in the event of its failure in this Congress, it is sure to be passed by our successors in these seats, who are already elected by the people, with a full understanding that they are to consummate this movement, and thus provide for the complete extermination of slavery in the Union.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me ask my Democratic colleagues upon this floor, of what possible advantage will the defeat of this measure be to our party at this time, in full view of the fact that our political opponents have the power to pass it immediately upon our adjournment in spite of us, and boldly proclaim their intention to do so at an extra session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, to be convened immediately after the 4th of March?

Looking at the subject as a party man, from a party point of view, as one who hopes soon to see the Democratic party again in power, this proposition seems to present a desirable opportunity for the Democracy to rid itself at once and forever of the incubus of slavery, and to banish its perplexing issues beyond the pale of party politics, no longer to distract our counsels and disturb the harmony of our movements. It has been our seeming adherence to slavery, in maintaining the principle of State rights, that has, year by year, depleted our party ranks until our once powerful organization has trailed its standard in the dust and sunk into a hopeless minority in nearly every State of the Union; and every year and every day we are growing weaker and weaker in popular favor, while our opponents are strengthening, because we will not venture to cut loose from the dead carcass of negro slavery. The institution of slavery was cruelly murdered in the house of its friends when they raised the standard of rebellion against the constitutional Government which had ever protected it from the popular disfavor that always attached to it in the North. When the Representatives of the slaveholding States, with base ingratitude, deserted the Democracy, which had always sustained their rights, and left their seats in Congress, while, with our coöperation, they had ample power to protect slavery even from such a measure as that now before the House, they not only gave a death-stab to the institution, but forever absolved the Democratic party, which had always protected it, from any further obligations to breast the storm of popular sentiment which will continue to rage against it in all the northern States until its prohibition, as contemplated in the resolution now before the House, shall have been incorporated into the Constitution. It is plain enough to my mind that if the Democratic party would regain its supremacy in the Government of the nation it must now let slavery "slide."

Why, Mr. Speaker, when the chosen Representatives of the border States upon this floor stand up and advocate this measure in the eloquent and persuasive tones which we have heard from the gentlemen from Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri, who have spoken in this debate; why, I ask, should the Representatives of the Democracy of the free States any longer contend against an inevitable result, especially when no advantage from such contention is to accrue to either our party or the country? Two gentlemen from Missouri, a State whose people have voluntarily abolished slavery since this House adjourned last July, [Messrs. ROLLINS and KING,] who, at the last session voted with me against this resolution, both of them being slaveholders, have spoken at this session in favor of it. They, who are far better qualified than I am to judge of the justice and propriety of this measure, have become convinced by the events of last year that the best interests of the country will be promoted by the passage of this resolution by the present Congress. I agree with them, Mr. Speaker, and I have become likewise convinced that the best good of the old Democratic party will be enhanced by its adoption. Upon the consummation of this measure a new organization of parties will be inevitable, and the slavery question being forever disposed of, other issues connected with the future interests and policy of the Government will divide the people; and it needs no prophet to foretell the speedy triumph of the true Democracy with the great principles inscribed upon its banner by Jefferson, Jackson, and other patriots and sages who have borne it aloft through the great political struggles of the past.

Suppose, Mr. Speaker, this House should fail to respond to the popular sentiment in passing this resolution, and the President should call an extra session of the next Congress, at which it should pass, as it undoubtedly will, so as to become an issue in our State elections next fall. In the light of past experience I would ask my friends on this side of the House if we could reasonably expect to successfully meet the prominent question that would be forced upon our party. All candidates for the Legislature would be confronted with this measure, and all our elections would necessarily be conducted with special reference to it. In the State of New York, if this negro question should be put out of our politics by the adoption of this resolution in season for the Legislature now in session to pass upon it, the Democracy, I doubt not, will elect a majority of both Houses of the next Legislature and reclaim full possession of the government of the Empire State upon the expiration of Governor Fenton's term. But if this question remains in issue I do not hesitate to express my opinion that outside of the cities of New York and Brooklyn scarcely a Senator or Assemblyman could be elected next November in the State. If my Democratic colleagues from the noble State of New York desire to see it redeemed from the Republican misrule which now prevails at Albany, I am confident that the most direct way of approaching that result will be found in the adoption of the resolution now before the House. It will dispose of the inevitable negro question and open an easy path to victory and the triumph of our party, in the popular vindication of the great principles which underlie its foundation. The passage of this resolution by Congress, in season to be finally disposed of by the present Legislature at Albany, will be more disastrous to our opponents in the State of New York than was the capture of Fort Fisher to the rebels. It will explode their chief magazine and spike their heaviest ordnance. The way will then be clear, and union and harmony being restored to our ranks, the political power of the State must inevitably come into our hands.

Then again, Mr. Speaker, in a national point of view, it is barely possible that the misguided people of the insurgent States, hopeless of establishing their independence, and nearly exhausted by the unequal struggle they have so long maintained, may be willing to return to their allegiance, even under the present Administration, for the sake of preserving the remains of slavery that still exist. The adoption of this resolution will open a way for the restoration of the southern States without subjecting them to what they would doubtless consider the humiliation of making any terms with the present Administration in regard to their peculiar institution. After they shall have laid down their arms, Mr. Speaker, under a general amnesty, and again taken their places as equal and sovereign States in the Union, they could vote upon this amendment, and the other States would come to the consideration of the subject with far different and more friendly feelings than those which may actuate them now. Perhaps, sir, in this way the South may, through the generosity of the loyal States, happy to welcome their "wayward sisters" back to the family of the Union, yet save slavery from the doom which certainly awaits it in any other contingency.

I have, however, little hope of such a result. All indications go now to show that the rebel leaders, undaunted by the disasters and undeterred by the sufferings of the people whom they rule with despotic power, are stubbornly determined to fight on to the bitter end. They appear, since the presidential election, to have thrown aside all ideas of reconciliation which they may have before entertained—for I believe that a reconciliation could have been effected had that election resulted differently—and will now accept no alternative but recognition or subjugation. Making every other consideration subordinate to their hatred of the Union, and satisfied that slavery must die, they have no doubt resolved to sacrifice to that passion even the institution for the protection of which they first raised their parabolic hands against the Government. No rational man can doubt that they are now ready to abolish slavery by their own action, if that will secure their recognition abroad, or the intervention of foreign Powers in their behalf. And it is not at all impossible that if they gained the former the latter would soon follow. I, for one, think there is imminent danger of such recognition and such intervention, because I feel convinced that the monarchies of Europe, and especially the Governments of France and England, regard it for their interest that a permanent separation between the North and the South shall take place, and a balance of power be established on this continent. The division of the United States into two distinct and unfriendly nations, both obliged to support large military and naval forces, weighed down with immense debts, and subject to all the burdens which depress the communities of Europe, would at once rob republicanism of many of the attractions with which our example has hitherto clothed it, protect the colonies of England on the north, and the nominally Mexican but really French empire on the south, from the "manifest destiny" with which the reintegration of the Union threatens them, and give to England and France, through the exclusive control of the cotton trade and the command of the transit routes in Mexico and Central America, the commercial supremacy of the world.

Fully satisfied that these consequences would flow from the success of the rebellion and the admission of the southern confederacy into the family of nations, I have always believed that France and England would never allow the restoration of the union of these States if it was possible for them to prevent it. Their interference was not to be feared when the rebellion was vigorous and defiant, but the danger increases in proportion as the rebellion shows signs of weakness and yielding. One great obstacle, Mr. Speaker, has always stood in the way of foreign intervention: the invincible hostility of the people of England and France to the institution of slavery. That obstacle the insurgent leaders are ready to remove, in order to claim the sympathies of the world as a people fighting only for the right of self-government, and abolishing slavery in order to secure their own liberty. We, in this country, know how utterly false such representations are. We know that they began the war for the protection of slavery, that they have carried on the war for four years for the preservation of slavery, and that they only consent now to abolish it because they know its abolition is inevitable. We know all these things, Mr. Speaker, but the people of France and England do not know them, and there is really great danger that the diplomacy of the rebels may excite a popular sentiment in those countries that will give their Governments the moral support without which they dare not venture to recognize the southern confederacy, or actively intervene in its behalf. I deem it of the utmost importance that our Government should checkmate these designs of the southern traitors. To enable it to do this, the adoption by us of the resolution now under consideration is indispensable. So it seems to me. By such action we will show the world that the South has abolished slavery only because it could not save it, and that we are not clinging to an effete institution after those whom it most concerns have given it up. We shall appear in our true light, as a resolute and patriotic people, contending for the life of the nation against traitors who rose in rebellion for the sake of slavery, and now seek to destroy the Government in revenge for the destruction of slavery. With the perfect apprehension of these facts which the adoption of this resolution will give to the people of foreign countries, I do not believe that their rulers will dare to lend either moral or material aid to our domestic foes; and this, Mr. Speaker, has been a consideration of great weight with me in arriving at a determination to vote for the resolution under consideration.

Such, Mr. Speaker, are the views and opinions, somewhat incongruous, I confess, which have brought me at last, after long deliberation, to a conclusion, the stronger in that it has not been lightly or carelessly formed. I feel it to be my duty now to vote for this resolution, and I shall do so whatever may be the consequences to me, politically or otherwise. I may incur the censure of some of my party friends on this floor, and perhaps displease some of my respected constituents; but to me the country of my birth and the Government under whose benign protection I have enjoyed all the blessings of liberty, and under which, restored to more than all its original splendor, and strengthened and purified by the trials through which it has passed, I expect my children and my children's children to enjoy the same blessings, long after my mortal frame shall have moldered into dust, is dearer to me than friends or party or political position. Firm in the consciousness of right, I know that posterity will do me justice, and feel that no descendant of mine will ever blush at the sight of the page on which my vote is recorded in favor of country, Government, liberty, and progress.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. It is not my intention to discuss the measure now pending before the House, but simply to give a résumé of the reasons which must determine my own course. This, upon a matter of so great importance and involving differences of opinion so wide, is due both to myself and to my constituents.

The amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery can be made effective in the rebellious States only by arms. But the President has already by proclamation declared those slaves free, and asserted his intention to use our armies to enforce it. The President has four years in which to try this experiment, with the unlimited control of the resources of the nation during that period; the amendment could not hasten military operations or take from the power of his master a single slave. It is therefore, for the purpose of abolishing slavery, without practical effect unless the President should recede from his declared intention of enforcing his proclamation.

It is mischievous in so far as it would tie the hands of the President in so regulating the mode of abolishing slavery as not to precipitate upon the country three million ignorant and debased negroes, without the slightest preparation for liberty, or power on the part of Government, by a system of apprenticeship or otherwise, to require them to labor.

It removes all inducement on the part of southerners to resist in the last instance the proposition of Davis to free and arm the southern slaves and turn them against our northern armies and people.

With that proposition slavery is a weapon in our hands and for our benefit. The slaveholders, between the hostile action of the two opposing parties, will be glad to save any portion of their rights; they will, when Davis undertakes to enforce his desperate policy, be only too willing to assent to an abolition as rapid as the interests either of the country at large or of the negroes themselves will permit.

It reserves no power, in case experience should demonstrate great evils in the intermixture of large masses of the black and white races, to guard by colonization against such evils.

It utterly ignores the greatest evil of slavery; extends through generations its effect in completely debasing the subject of it and making him unfit either to be a good citizen or a good man.

It violates that good faith which all civilized Governments have hitherto observed, by destroying valuable rights hitherto acknowledged as property, and yet refusing compensation.

England, in emancipating the slaves on her islands, not only established a system of apprenticeship, but compensated those who lost. It is no answer that slavery is immoral; individuals, upon the faith of laws which recognized rights in negro labor, have invested their property in such rights. When the Government sees fit to change its policy and destroy the rights, it owes compensation. Of course compensation is due only to loyal owners.

It is a dangerous abuse of the power of amendment conferred by the Constitution.

I agree with neither of the gentlemen who have argued the constitutional effect of such an amendment. I draw a distinction between the right to make such an amendment and the power to make it. The right affects the consciences of those authorized to act, the power the consequences of the act when complete. In most of our States, by constitutional enactment, no person can twice be put in jeopardy for the same offense; the verdict of a jury, therefore, acquitting a criminal is not susceptible of a review; no matter how corrupt or how much in violation of law, it is final and conclusive. They have, therefore, power to disregard the instructions of the judge on points of law and acquit an acknowledged criminal, but they have no such right, and it would be a violation of conscience and of their highest duty. Amendments proposed by two thirds of Congress and ratified by three fourths of the States become part of the Constitution. The power of determining what is or is not an amendment rests with Congress and three fourths of the States; they, on their consciences and oaths, say that any provision is an amendment, and nowhere is there a power, except by revolution, which can hold that determination wrong. The Supreme Court cannot, because the very existence of that court is, beyond question, within the power of amendment. Congress and the three fourths of the States are therefore the final judges as well of what is an amendment, or the removal of a defect, as of the propriety of making it a part of the Constitution. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] is therefore right in saying that the power of amendment extends even to creating a king. But this is only because our decision, supported by three fourths of the States, is final, and if we are false to our oaths there is no review. But I hold that if, upon a desert island where there is no civil government, one man kills another, he is not the less a murderer because there is no power to punish. And in our case, the fact that we are to act as judges as well as legislators only increases the responsibility of observing strictly the spirit and object of the Constitution.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in sustaining the validity of the United States Bank, put their decision on the ground that the decision of Congress in declaring it necessary as a fiscal agent of Government could not be reviewed. It was true, as a part of the current history of the period, that its fiscal agency had little influence upon its creation, and that its general financial power and the regulation of exchanges were the chief objects it accomplished; but Congress decided otherwise, and an institution at war with the real spirit of our Government was preserved. Our present banking law, if (as I do not believe) it should finally be sustained by the highest tribunals, must be sustained on the ground of the decision of Congress that it was the fiscal agent of Government, or necessary as a part of its financial system, although the majority of us, and doubtless the courts themselves, believe that it was a scheme to enable overgrown moneyed capitalists to increase their gains from the necessities of the country, and to escape from their share of State taxation, (necessary to sustain the war,) and throw the whole burden upon the poorer classes, real estate owners, laboring and business men. It is therefore as judges that we are to say that the proposition before the House is an amendment within the spirit of the Constitution.

An amendment implies the removal of a defect or an improvement upon the Constitution; it is necessarily consistent with and not destructive of the Constitution in its true spirit. It is to the fabric of government very nearly what "repair" is to a building. There is probably no lawyer in this House who has not been employed in cases involving the distinction between a new erection and repairs. It is almost impossible to give any general definition by which, in every case, the distinction between the two can be determined; but almost every one in ordinary cases can feel that distinction. The power given is to amend, and an amendment must be consistent with the fabric, improving portions of it. Here again I must illustrate, by reference to ordinary life, another distinction.

I have said that the word amendment in the fabric of the Constitution answers very nearly to "repair" as applied to buildings, but addition is very different from either repair or amendment. The owner of a house is discontented with its extent; he adds a library-room, a dining-room, or a kitchen; this is no repair; nor would any addition in substance to the powers of the General Government or any destruction of the powers of the State be an amendment. Still I concede that amendment has a somewhat more extensive significance than repair, and that it would not be always safe to resort to the analogy.

The Constitution in its true spirit delegated certain powers of general interest in every State to the General Government; in no instance did it seek to interfere with the merely local interests or institutions of any State. Indeed, any such interference would be entirely inconsistent with the declaration of the Constitution itself as to its objects. I do not believe that any one State voting for the Constitution would have done so had any such exercise of the power of amendment been deemed possible. We are therefore on our oaths to declare that interference with an institution local in its character is not merely an addition to the powers of the General Government as a destruction of the local powers of the States, but is a matter necessary to the general weal of all parts of the country. I cannot so hold, and am less inclined so to hold because there is no tribunal to review our decision. I am not now and never have been an apologist for slavery. I have never believed that it could be a permanent institution; the seeds of death were in its nature. Had I lived in Maryland I should have voted to abolish slavery; I should so have voted in Missouri; I would so vote in Kentucky. Their material interests will undoubtedly be advanced by such abolition; but it is still a question reserved under the Constitution for their own people.

This is, however, not even a question of the practical abolition of slavery. There are causes at work, which in any event will destroy it; the progress of our armies is wasting it; even a recognition of the confederacy would not save it from its final doom. The rebels have themselves challenged for their favorite institution the attention and hostility of the world; they have placed it in the front rank, where every blow dealt by our soldiers at rebellion strikes it with destructive force.

Thousands of the most intelligent have already escaped; new ideas as to liberty (a word hitherto unknown to them) have through intermingling with our soldiers been scattered among them; the patient drudge of former times (who then scarce knew that he had a soul) will soon inquire into the reason why his bone and sinews are the property of another; the wealth of the southerner in slavery, if it cannot take to itself wings, will at least take to itself legs and disappear.

Nor am I altogether indifferent to the effects upon national character of such an amendment. It is a declaration upon our part that slavery is not merely a local institution, but a national sin, sustained and upheld by the Constitution. Our fathers carefully avoided the possibility of this charge; nowhere have they used in the Constitution the word slave. In providing for their surrender it uses the words "persons held to service or labor;" in depriving the South of full representation for slaves, it requires an enumeration of free persons, &c., and three fourths of all others. So careful were they to avoid a recognition in any way of slavery! We might fairly change these two provisions; but to ingraft upon the Constitution a provision abolishing slavery, is to declare upon our oaths that slavery was connected with the purposes and object of the Constitution, and belonged to the North as well as to the South.

But while for the reasons stated I cannot vote for the amendment, I have been extremely doubtful whether I ought to vote against it. I recognize the absolute fealty due from a member of Congress to the interests of his country and his constituents. Not only is it his duty, as a matter of conscience, not to vote for a bad measure, but he is bound, when he cannot defeat bad legislation, not to increase the evil by useless opposition. We all know that in the next Congress there is a majority of extreme men. They will, without regard to the effect of this measure upon the country, pass it. And whatever may be the personal wishes of the President, he is so committed to the radicals on this question that he must call a special session of Congress. A session of Congress unsettles all the business interests of the country. No man seeking legitimate profits can know what course to pursue. Some new freak of legislation may tax him into bankruptcy, or so depreciate the currency as to effect the same result. Better a pestilence than a session of Congress, so far as business is concerned. If a session is pernicious to the business interests, it is ten times more so to our armies. Each day politicians throw stumbling-blocks in their path. It was only yesterday that this House passed a resolution impliedly censuring the most successful general of the war—a complete soldier in his plans, a hero in the field, a statesman in council. I mean General Sherman.

If, then, there is no hope of great advantage by the mere delay of this measure, it is the duty of those opposed to it not to vote.

But is it not of the greatest consequence to relieve our armies, even for a short time, of this burden, which we are attempting to put upon their shoulders? Grant, Thomas, and Sherman, in despite of both rebels and radicals, may, if we delay this blow at them, succeed in a few months in overthrowing the rebellion. I have stated that, so far as slavery is concerned, I consider this question as one involving simply the difference between a healthful process of emancipation and one injurious alike to the negro and the country. But that is certainly a mere matter of opinion, and gentlemen honestly believing in emancipation may well ask for a security. I have, to avoid this doubt, drawn a substitute for the amendment, which obviates the greater part of the practical objections which I have raised; it leaving only the question of abuse of power. I ask that it may be read, as at the proper time I intend to offer it.

The amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. 1. Hereafter every sale, transfer, or assignment of the right of one person to the service or labor of another, shall be void; and by the mere fact of the consent of the owner to such sale, assignment, or transfer, the person owing service or labor shall be released from all such obligation and become free.

SEC. 2. All females, such as are usually termed slaves, owing service or labor to others, are hereby released from such obligation, and are and shall be wholly free.

SEC. 3. From and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1880, slavery, and all involuntary service, except that arising from the relations of parent and child, master and apprentice, guardian and ward, or that imposed as a punishment for crime, are and shall be abolished.

SEC. 4. Congress shall by law provide compensation for the actual and direct damage or loss sustained through the operation of this law, by loyal citizens of the United States.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. It will be perceived that it immediately obviates the worst objections to negro slavery, and yet presents inducements for the rebels to return to their allegiance. It is much better for them than Davis's proposition to free and arm the slaves, and therefore may defeat that measure.

It prevents an industrial revolution which, destroying the South, will utterly forbid the idea of aid from that quarter in paying the interest on our public debt.

If this substitute is accepted, while I cannot directly vote for it, as being an abuse of power, I shall not vote against it, and I am well assured that there are others on the Democratic side who will either directly or indirectly support it; so that the measure will pass the House. It is for gentlemen on the other side to say whether they urged this in good faith, or as politicians; if in the first view, they will accept the substitute; if in the last, reject it.

Mr. HARDING addressed the House. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. Mr. Speaker, the argument upon the question now before the House has been so ably conducted and so long continued that it is with more of less reluctance I venture to delay the public business by stating even briefly the reasons which induce me to dissent from a majority of my fellow-members, and to cast my vote, as I propose to do, to maintain the Constitution as it is and as it was when our country, governed under it, was marching with proud and stately step to empire and to greatness. I am not sure, sir, that I would trespass at all upon the House at this stage of its proceedings upon this question if it were not for the fact that my immediate associate, speaking for a constituency closely connected with that which I have the honor to represent, sees the line of his duty in a different direction from that which I propose to take. Though what I have to say may not influence the vote of any member who hears me, still, sir, I believe the people of the great city in whose behalf I have the honor in part to speak on this floor would not be fairly represented in the national councils if I did not in the name, and I believe with the approval, of a large majority of them state here that their faith in the Constitution as it is and as it was when they required of me the promise to faithfully maintain it, is not impaired by anything which has since transpired, but that, on the contrary, they cling to it still as their fathers did before them as to the sheet-anchor of their safety.

Mr. Speaker, I have watched the course of events to little purpose if the troubles which now surround us are in any degree due to imperfections in the Constitution; on the contrary, sir, I am mistaken if these troubles might not have been averted had we rendered a more cheerful, a more implicit obedience to that instrument. Instead of squaring the Constitution to suit our notions, we would do better to make our opinions conform to the Constitution. All our misfortunes are, to my mind, clearly traceable to a disregard of its provisions. I can understand those who have never loved the Constitution in the past eager to tinker it now, and if you show me a man who has been noted in the past for disloyalty to the Constitution, and for his disregard for the Union which it made possible, I will show you a man in favor of this amendment. The party to which I belong have looked ever to the Constitution as the guide of their policy. It was the chart by which they directed the course of the ship of State in the better days when the vessel was under their guidance. The chart has been discarded by others; the ship is among the breakers; storms, dark and menacing, shut out the sky. In such an hour, instead of trying to amend the chart, I am for following it, and I doubt not, if we do, but that there is still a pleasant voyage before us, and a haven of safety at the end of it, in which the old ship may lie in security and at peace.

I am told, Mr. Speaker, that if I desire to save the Democratic party I will help to amend the Constitution so as to abolish slavery; I must try to cut it loose, so it is said, from dead issues. Singularly enough, sir, this advice comes from men who have spent their lives in misrepresenting the Democratic party and in vilifying its leaders. These men have become very suddenly solicitous for the welfare of the Democracy. They tell us, sir, there is a great future in store for us, if we Democrats only follow their advice. I am suspicious of this new-born zeal for the interest of the Democratic party coming from such a source. I for one have not learned Democracy from its most inveterate foes, and I will not place myself under their instruction now. I cannot but believe that my immediate colleague has been giving too much importance to this new school of Democratic advisers. I am afraid, sir, he is repeating second-hand the charge that the Democratic party had been always subservient to the South, and found its subservience followed by increased exactions in the interest of slavery. I owe it to my own self-respect as a Democrat, I owe it to my party, to say that this charge is entirely unfounded. When the South asked what the Constitution gave her we cheerfully yielded that; we as Democrats could not do less, and we never did more. My colleague again says that he has an especial enmity against the South as a Democrat, because the South abandoned the Democratic party. Well, sir, here the South committed for herself and for all of us a very sad mistake, as all who purpose to follow the bad example will; but I cannot believe that the spirit of revenge and recrimination which such remarks as these indicate is that which should be indulged in by those who are intrusted with the grave responsibility which devolves on the members of this body. Not only the South, but a majority of the people of the North, have abandoned, temporarily, the Democratic party; and sir, the majority of both sections have traveled further, and I believe have fared worse.

Mr. Speaker, since I entered this House I have endeavored to shape my conduct to the end that no word or act of mine would stand in the way of the restoration of peace and Union to these States. I believe the legislation of the country should be shaped in the spirit by which, I believe, I have been actuated. In my opinion the amendment you now propose to provide for may stand in the way of both peace and Union. Even while this measure is under discussion messengers are passing between Washington and Richmond, and if these men are successful, and if the negotiations they propose to inaugurate result in anything, the very question we now propose to commit ourselves upon will form the chief obstacle in the way of a settlement of our difficulties. Suppose, sir, that the South should be willing, as the basis of peace, to consent to gradual emancipation? Should we place ourselves in a position that would prevent the acceptance of such terms? The amendment you now propose to make will then stand as the only obstacle in the way of peace. If there be men here willing to risk the life of the nation on the hazard of battle, and willing to see rivers of human blood shed for immediate as against gradual emancipation, among such men I do not desire to be numbered.

It is not many months since the President of the United States, above his own signature, publicly stated that if he could save the Union he would do so, irrespective of slavery. I am for leaving open to him the opportunity of redeeming the pledge thus given to the country. Since that time the President, in his famous note addressed "to all whom it may concern," insisted upon the abolition of slavery as a preliminary to peace. The position taken in that document was so generally condemned that even the editor of the New York Tribune was disgusted by the folly of the man who wrote it. We now propose to commit the country to a policy which everybody condemned but a few months ago. Sir, I, for one, cannot give my vote to do it. The proclamation of emancipation was all but universally condemned by the true friends of the Union. I believed it to be at once impolitic and illegal, and yet I am asked to give my assent now to legalize a policy which I cannot approve of, either in the President or in Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to save the party in power from itself, and I tell its leaders here that they had better never have been born than live to see the day when their experiments in legislation, of which this amendment is one, may be the chief obstacle in the way of the realization of that most dear to the truly loyal American heart—the restoration of the Union.

While I have argued, sir, against this measure as if it were in truth an "amendment" to the Constitution, I regard it as subversive of the entire spirit of that instrument. We have been warned by the "Father of his country" to discountenance irregular opposition to the Constitution, "and at the same time to resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretexts." One method of assault, he tells us, sir, "may be to effect in the forms of the Constitution alterations which will impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown." These, sir, are words of prophetic warning. Under "SPECIOUS PRETEXTS" of amending the Constitution, you desire to make it the instrument of depriving men of vested rights, and to leave behind you a precedent which, if followed, will leave every right, civil or religious, which the minority possesses at the will of the majority. When the Constitution went into operation there were twelve slave States and but one free State. It was within the power of the twelve slave States to force slavery on Massachusetts, in the same way that you propose to force abolition on the South. Would Massachusetts, think you, have submitted to so gross a perversion of the compact she had just entered into? Did she fight against England for seven years for the right to manage her own affairs only to transfer that right to another authority against which she had no legal safeguard? Sir, Massachusetts might have been left a wilderness, but this right could not have been wrested from her people. Do you propose to force from South Carolina, men of Massachusetts, what you would have yielded yourselves only with your lives?

We are told, sir, and the fact seems to be conceded by a vast majority of those in favor of this measure, that slavery is dead. The progress of the war and the incidents connected with it, we are told, have destroyed the institution in this country, and placed it beyond the hope of resurrection. Why then do we find gentlemen, and especially those most clamorous in insisting that slavery is dead, so urgent and pertinacious in seeking to lay sacrilegious hands upon that venerated and almost sacred instrument, our glorious Constitution, under the pretense that alteration of it is necessary for the abolition of slavery? Has not its abolition been proclaimed by the President? Nay, further, does not the President demand as a condition precedent to the restoration of peace, and in fact as the only terms upon which he will consent to a restoration of the Union, that the States in rebellion shall themselves abolish slavery? In the face of all this, how can his political supporters now deny that the destruction of slavery is demanded at our hands? Taking these gentlemen at their words, Mr. Speaker, and there is no necessity for any change in the Constitution to secure the abolition of slavery. What, then, is their object in demanding this change? Let us beware that under a false plea other and more nefarious objects are not really sought to be obtained, and which it is feared openly to avow; such as the establishment of freedmen's bureaus with numerous hordes of political leeches, confiscation of property, to be divided among favored victors, and kindred and equally objectionable schemes which have found advocates upon this floor. Above all this, in the absence of any valid reason for bringing this proposition again before the present Congress, let us make ourselves sure that it is not in reality a covert attempt to ascertain to what extent the American people are willing to consent that the sovereignty of the States shall be curtailed and their form of government converted into a strong, centralized, imperial Power. It is not the first time in our history that such an attempt has been made. Nay, sir, it was resistance to such an attempt that gave existence to the Democratic party itself. There are some of us who can remember the administration of the elder Adams, who remember his odious alien and sedition laws, and other measures of his administration destructive alike of the rights of the States and the liberty of individuals.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 34.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, even admitting, which I do not, that the Constitution needs amendment in reference to the question of slavery, that this is not the proper time to agitate, much less to act upon, so grave and important a question. Let us wait until the nation shall calmly repose in peace, and all feelings of enmity toward our erring brethren of the South shall have subsided, and good-will and harmony again prevail over all sections of the country. Now, in the midst of war, when passion and prejudice are inflamed to their highest pitch, is not the time to essay the amendment of our fundamental law; and the more especially when it is admitted by the advocates themselves of the proposition to amend that the object they seek to attain, namely, the abolition of slavery, has already been accomplished. Let us not, impelled by the mere excitement of the hour, engage in acts which may cause us to repent for all future time. We have, Mr. Speaker, in the history of one of our churches an apt illustration proving how in our over-zeal to accomplish an apparent right we may perpetrate the most palpable wrong. The Methodist church in this country was originally, and for many years after its establishment, a prosperous and a united body. Some years ago abolitionism made its appearance in the church, and in the over-anxiety of some of the members for the welfare of the negro, it came very near being the instrument, in bad hands, of working grievous wrong upon a portion of their white brethren. It was first insisted upon that slaveholders should be disqualified from holding the office of bishop in the church. This disqualification was next extended to the ministry, and afterward urged by some to the extent of applying it to laymen by excluding them from membership. A disruption of the church was the natural consequence, and the sequel was the establishment of two distinct and separate bodies, the Methodist church North and the Methodist church South. After the separation, the church South insisted upon having their pro rata share of the property owned in common by the disrupted body, and also a proportionate share of the fund raised for the support and maintenance of aged and indigent preachers, (to which they had contributed,) but the radical abolition wing of the church North denied their application. The injustice of their proceeding must be clearly manifest to every unprejudiced mind, and I refer to it only as an illustration of the extent to which men impelled by an ultra spirit of fanaticism may become blinded to the most palpable considerations of even-handed justice. Of course the church South could not submit to be deprived of their rights and their property upon the simple plea that they were slaveholders, and not to be recognized for that reason as part of the church community, and they applied to the Supreme Court of the United States for redress. The result was a verdict in their favor.

Does not this history, Mr. Speaker, afford us a lesson and warning which we should heed? It is not many years since the occurrence of these events, and many who were participants therein are yet on the stage of action. I have no doubt that they are now satisfied that they were then in error, and will agree with me that they should not too hastily act where it is possible that hurried action may cause injustice and wrong.

Let us then, in our action in reference to this question of constitutional amendment, heed this lesson, and be careful not to encroach upon the rights or enslave the white man, under the mistaken idea that we are thereby benefiting the negro. A blind spirit of fanaticism, under the excited passions of the moment, if suffered to sway our action, can bring harm only to both races and to the country.

There is, Mr. Speaker, another reason which should induce us to approach the consideration of this question with great caution. Adopt this amendment to the Constitution, force it upon the States now in rebellion, and let the result be then restoration to the Union, and who can predict what stumbling-blocks may be thrown in the way of the execution of the Federal laws on the subject? The abolition of slavery forced upon them without their consent and against their will, it is but natural to suppose that the people of those States will not feel particularly anxious to aid in carrying the measure into practical effect. Every one remembers the trouble experienced in the execution of the Federal law known as the fugitive slave law in some of the States which now claim to be filled to overflowing with what in modern parlance is called "loyalty to the Federal Government," but which, in my humble opinion, oftener partakes of the nature of party fealty than of that of true patriotism. In opposition to that law, some of the States adopted enactments going to the extent of disfranchising officials or citizens attempting or aiding to enforce it. Is there not, at least, danger to be apprehended that other States, following this example, may in like manner attempt to thwart and interfere with the execution of laws carrying into effect the abolition of slavery? Would it not be better to wait until the people of these States themselves, by their own action, provide for the practical abolition of slavery, or rather for the removal of the corpse from which, we are told, the life has long since departed. All the free States at the North have done so, and Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, Missouri, Louisiana, and Tennessee are said to have followed suit already. Why not leave the causes which operated upon these States to work out the same effects upon their sister slave States?

Mr. Speaker, the platform upon which I was elected was "the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was." The Constitution was framed by far better and wiser men than ourselves. They are all gone, but they have left a record of purity and patriotism that in my opinion casts far in the shade the blatant claims of the most loud-mouthed and loyal of all the "loyal leaguers" in the land. For myself, Mr. Speaker, I shall prefer to be guided in my action by the landmarks laid down by the fathers of the Republic, and which, adhered to three quarters of a century, bore the ship of State safely and prosperously upon a glorious career, and the disregard of which has thrown the noble craft among the rocks which now threaten her destruction.

I shall strive to preserve inviolate the pledges I have made to support and defend the Constitution. I have lived under it for half a century, and I but do justice to my constituency and reflect their views when I say that they have not only been happy and contented under the rule of the Constitution, but will never consent to its amendment until at least the necessity for it shall be so manifest that the question shall not be fairly open to controversy.

The abstract question of our right to amend the Constitution has been discussed at length and with great ability by members on both sides of the House, but the debate has elicited little really new. Conceding, even, that Congress has the right to amend the Constitution in reference to slavery as a domestic institution (which I do not) my position is that this is not the proper time for this power to be exercised. The pretense assigned by some that Congress should abolish slavery for the purpose of benefiting the slaveholders themselves is to my mind simply absurd. Are they incompetent to judge as to what is best for their own interests, and Congress alone competent so to do? That is the argument; and what an argument it is to be seriously urged in a representative republican Government like ours! It is the old British theory that "King and Parliament are omnipotent," and which our fathers repudiated when they framed our Constitution. Those who favor this theory are at least consistent in advocating an amendment of this instrument.

It is claimed by some that the result of the recent presidential election affords conclusive evidence of the fact that the people are in favor of amending the Constitution of the United States so that it shall abolish and prohibit slavery. This I deny. Whatever may have been the hopes and wishes of ultra abolitionists, I insist that this was not the issue made up and presented to the people. In my own State, at least, I know that this was not the case. What is the record in connection with this question? At the last session of Congress this same resolution was submitted and it failed to pass. The people had every reason to suppose that would be the end of it.

There may be some who will claim that the fact that Reuben E. Fenton received a majority of the votes of New York State for Governor is to be received as an indorsement of his act in voting in favor of this proposition at the last session of Congress. This claim, I imagine, will not bear the test of the slightest scrutiny. There were other causes which produced that result. The people, in my opinion, were in many cases led astray by brawling, hireling demagogues, who lived and thrived upon the spoils of office; who misrepresented the position of the Democratic party by charging its leaders as being in favor of a dishonorable peace at the sacrifice of the Union. In addition there was brought to bear in favor of Mr. Fenton and his party the immense patronage of the General Government; the army of custom-house, post office, and internal revenue officials; the employes in the navy-yard; Army and Navy contractors, and others. Yet with all this aid the party supporting Mr. Fenton would have failed (as I think even my colleague will concede) had the thousands who were unable to deposit their votes in New York and Brooklyn in consequence of inadequate provision for their reception, have been able to express their preferences at the ballot-box, and the Democratic soldiers now serving their country in the field been at home to vote untrammelled. I feel assured no reasonable man could have doubted but that the State would have given a handsome majority. Even as it was, sir, Mr. Fenton's majority was less than the number of Government employes in the single city of Brooklyn. I say, then, it is preposterous to claim that the people of the State of New York voted in favor of this constitutional amendment. So far from the question being submitted to them, it was carefully kept out of view during the campaign.

The platform upon which those of us from New York representing Democratic constituencies stood when we were elected was, "the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was." My colleague, I believe, stood there with me then; for myself, I am content to stand there now. The phrase, "the Constitution as it is," admits of no misunderstanding; it is plain, direct, and unequivocal, and cannot be tortured to mean the Constitution as a party majority see fit to make it. "The Union as it was," I construe to mean the Union of former days, when constitutional guarantees were regarded as sacred by all sections of the country, and the integrity of that Union, with or without slavery, it will be my humble effort ever to preserve inviolate.

Mr. Speaker, there are those, and my colleague is among them, who plead as an excuse for voting for this proposition that after all it amounts merely to a reference of the question to the people of the States, and they are finally to decide the question. This argument would, I confess, have some force with me if it was a correct one, but so far as New York is concerned it is not. The present Legislature of the State will be in session long after this Congress has ceased to exist, and it is to that Legislature, who have already given utterance to their sentiments upon the subject, that this resolution, if it passes, will be referred. But, sir, as a Representative in this House I cannot fulfill the duty intrusted to me by shirking a responsibility which I am called upon to bear. My constituents do not desire this measure. I fulfill their wishes and perform my own duty in voting against it.

The Legislature now in session was not chosen with reference to the opinion of its members or their probable action upon the proposed constitutional amendment. No one will claim it, and yet it is proposed by my colleague that they shall act for the people of the State on the subject. Divided up as are the counties the Republican party, with a bare majority of the popular vote of the State, has nearly two thirds of the Legislature, and judging from the acts of their Representatives here it is easy to predict what would have been their action. The people of New York will never be permitted to give a direct vote upon the question. For one I will never consent that the voice of my constituents shall thus be suppressed and overridden.

Mr. Speaker, I am no advocate of slavery. Years ago I was opposed to its extension, so far as I could legally and constitutionally do so, beyond the limits within which it then existed. I believed slavery to be an evil then, and I believe it to be an evil now. I have been charged with inconsistency by some of my Democratic friends, who, when the institution had powerful friends, favored its extension, but who now, when its power has departed, are over-zealous in efforts to exterminate it. Nay, they are not satisfied with its acknowledged death, but are clamorous to be allowed to act as grave diggers at its burial. It is, perhaps, the zeal which we are told ever inspires new converts. For myself I have only to say that I have endeavored to be thoroughly consistent. My opposition to slavery does not permit me to aid in perpetrating gross wrong. I hope that slavery may be abolished, and have ever hoped so, but not through the impulses of a wild fanaticism, surging on reckless of the rights and interests alike of the slave and the slaveholder; not by the exercise of doubtful powers under the excitement of passion and prejudice, but by calm, careful, and considerate action. Let us convince the States interested in its abolition of its propriety, and let them abolish it, as under the Constitution they may do, and as some of them are doing. It is purely a local question, and Congress might with as much propriety interfere with the system of labor in the large manufacturing establishments in the East, as with slavery in the South, because evils are incidental to both. These have ever been my views, and they are my views now, and I cannot see wherein they are inconsistent.

Among other reasons adduced by my colleague for favoring the proposed amendment, is the alleged effect slavery produces in retarding the growth and prosperity of the States where it exists as compared with those where it does not. This is, in my judgment, jumping at conclusions. Why, let me ask my friend, does New York show a greater growth and a greater degree of prosperity than New Hampshire or Vermont? Is it because the latter are slave States? Why, let me ask again, does the city of Providence show a greater degree of prosperity and advancement than the city of Warren, both in Rhode Island, and both free? He will look in vain to find in slavery a solution of these questions. There are other causes which produce the effects ascribed by him solely to the institution of slavery, and my friend cannot but admit this if he compares the statistics of Louisiana or Georgia with those of New Hampshire or Vermont, or those of New Orleans with those of Newburyport or Bennington.

My colleague further says:

"When labor shall be free at the South, then will it command and have the respect which is its just due. Then will millions of the white men of the North participate and share in the blessings thus secured. The masses of our native and foreign-born laborers, now toiling in the severer climate of the North, will be invited to enter upon these newly opened fields for their industry and occupation. The now hidden resources of the States south will be developed by the brain and muscle of the northern laborer."

I, sir, was of the class he alludes to. My Caucasian blood revolts at the idea advanced by my friend, that were the negroes freed by abolishing slavery the South would at once become the El Dorado of the native and foreign-born white laborer of the North by allowing him the privilege of laboring side by side with the African freedman of the South. We may as well expect the most opposite things in nature to be reconciled, the most incongruous to harmonize, as that such a thing can happen. He needs but to take one step further to advocate amalgamation.

I hope, sir, that this hitherto glorious and happy country, the home and asylum of millions of white men, will not be doomed to become the land of a race of hybrids, and thus by degrees be blotted out of existence in accordance with the immutable laws of nature.

Another question, Mr. Speaker, although of great importance, appears to be silently passed over by those favoring the amendment. How, sir, are the expenses of this war to be paid? Are they to be borne and made a burden upon the white labor of the North solely? Abolish slavery, and you destroy the ability on the part of the South to contribute a portion of what they should in justice be held to pay. Adopt the plan of gradual emancipation, as proposed, and it is reasonable to suppose they would be unable to bear their share. The South have been largely instrumental in creating this liability, and should not be permitted to evade payment by affording them an excuse for it. This cannot but be the case, unless abolition at the South produces results totally different from those experienced elsewhere, and the natural habits of the negro have become entirely changed. Indirect confiscation of the lands, if they should under the circumstances be of sufficient or any value, will have to be resorted to to get from the States now in rebellion what under a more humane and politic system might have been more easily obtained. Conciliatory action on our part, combined with proper vigilance, is more likely to produce good results than any system of violence and severity, which only produces irritation and discontent, and which is almost sure to result in real injury to the white man, while of doubtful benefit to the freedmen of African descent.

I have briefly stated my reasons, Mr. Speaker, for being opposed to the passage of any resolution having for its object a change in the fundamental law of the land, and shall vote against it. In so doing I shall act not only as my own convictions prompt me, but I am satisfied in direct conformity with the wishes of those whom I represent.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, permit me to add that I have been for thirty years a Democrat. The experience of a long and not uneventful life only lead me to place fuller and firmer faith in the principles of my party. I have seen these principles one by one stricken down, but in their fall I have seen no advantage to my country. I see in this amendment to the Constitution but the consummation of a policy which has led to the bloodiest war in history, and which has placed the fate of the Republic more than once on the hazard of battle. Upon you, gentlemen, upon the other side, the responsibility for this measure must rest. I, for one, cannot and will not aid you. You will soon have full power; exercise it. Take all the credit the act will bring, and assume all the danger it involves. The Democratic party will stand by its old and well tried policy, guided by its old land-marks, under its old banner, and keeping step to the music of the Union. I cannot wish my country better, sir, than that the party opposed to that to which I belong rival the success of the Democracy, and shall emulate its glory.

But I am constrained to say the past history of the party in power excites in my breast but little hope for the future. I am weary of the experimental legislation, ending no man can tell in what unforeseen disaster. Of such legislation the proposed amendment is a bad specimen, and I shall vote against it.

Mr. ASHLEY. I call the previous question upon the pending motion to reconsider the vote by which the House on the 15th of last June rejected a joint resolution (S. No. 16) submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. STILES. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; and upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 111, not voting 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. So the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri, stated that Mr. ROGERS, of New Jersey, had been confined to his room several days by indisposition.

Mr. CRAVENS stated that Mr. VOORHEES was still detained at his home in Indiana in consequence of severe sickness in his family.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question being on the motion of Mr. ASHLEY, to reconsider,

Mr. ANCONA called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 57, not voting 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. son, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Ross, Scott, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Townsend, Wadsworth, Ward, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood—57.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Augustus C. Baldwin, Hutchins, Lazear, Le Blond, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, Nelson, Radford, Rogers, John B. Steele, and Voorhees—13.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. ASHLEY. I demand the previous question.

Mr. MALLORY. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is that a vote to reconsider the vote by which the subject now before the House was disposed of in June last requires two thirds of this body. That two-thirds vote has not been obtained.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The rules of the House authorize every bill and joint resolution to pass by a majority vote. The Constitution of the United States, however, declares that no constitutional amendment shall pass except by a two-thirds vote. On the question of the passage of the joint resolution the constitutional provision will operate, and not till that time. All other questions are governed by the rules of the House.

The Chair will state that this has been the uniform usage of the House in regard to bills vetoed by the President. In such cases all votes up to the time of taking the question on the passage of the bill over the President's veto are decided by a majority vote; but on the final vote a two-thirds vote is necessary.

Mr. MALLORY. My action upon this question of order will depend a good deal on the response to a proposition which I am about to make to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY.] There are gentlemen belonging to this side of the House who can be here to-morrow, but who are not here to-day, who are anxious to vote upon this question. If the gentleman from Ohio will agree that the vote shall be taken at a fixed hour to-morrow, all action upon this side of the House for delay will cease.

Mr. ASHLEY. It has been the universal understanding that we were to have a vote to-day. Gentlemen upon the other side of the House will bear me witness that I have prolonged this debate against the protest of gentlemen upon this side of the House and of leading friends of the measure in the country; and I think it does not come with a very good grace from the gentleman from Kentucky, in view of the time which has been extended to his friends on that side of the House, that he should demand now, when notice was given again and again that a vote would be taken to-day, that it shall be postponed until to-morrow. It seems to me that if gentlemen choose to absent themselves from the House their action ought not to operate either to keep us in session here or justify members in resorting to the usual parliamentary rules to procrastinate and put off the vote.

Mr. MALLORY. I was not aware that any understanding had been arrived at as to a vote on this question to-day. It was postponed till to-day, but at that time there was certainly no understanding that there should be a vote to-day.

Mr. ASHLEY. In reply to a question by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STILES,] I gave notice last week that the vote would be taken to-day; and at the beginning of the discussion this morning I fixed three o'clock as the time the vote would be taken, instead of which we have procrastinated it almost an hour to accommodate gentlemen upon the other side of the House.

Mr. MALLORY. Did that understanding exist upon this side of the House? If it did and if gentlemen will say so, I shall take no action in this matter.

Several MEMBERS. It was so understood.

Mr. ASHLEY. I cannot yield any further. I desired this morning to be heard on this question, and came into the House intending to close the debate, as under the rules I had a right to do. The time, the subject, and the occasion, all united to make it desirable; but I yielded the time to gentlemen on the other side, until it is now nearly four o'clock, and members on all sides of the House demand a vote. I therefore decline to take up the time of the House, and demand that the main question shall now be put.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me to offer a substitute for the joint resolution.

Mr. ASHLEY. I cannot yield for that purpose. I have a substitute myself, which I should much prefer to the original joint resolution, but I do not offer it.

The SPEAKER. No motion to amend would be in order at this stage. The joint resolution has passed its third reading, and is now on its passage.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio says that he has a substitute which he himself prefers to this joint resolution. If so, why does he not offer it to the House? There certainly will be no objection on this side.

Mr. ASHLEY. I do not offer it, because I would not procrastinate this discussion or hazard the passage of the measure.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It seems to me that if the gentleman has a better substitute, he should propose it. [Calls to order.]

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. DAWSON called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 119, nays 56, not voting 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Bow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Colfax, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, English, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Herrick, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Mallory, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, Melndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Pendleton, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Strouse, Stuart, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Ward, Eltha B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Winley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Woodbridge—121.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Coffroth, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Grider, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Knapp, Law, Long, Morrison, Noble, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ross, Stiles, Townsend, and Joseph W. White—24.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Clay, Cravens, Dumont, Finck, Ganson, Hall, Harding, Hooper, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Lazear, Le Blond, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, John O'Neill, Orth, Perry, Pruyn, Robinson, Rogers, Smith, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Sweet, Voorhees, Webster, Chilton A. White, Fernando Wood, Worthington, and Yeaman—37.

The House thereupon (at twenty minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 1, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL, D. D.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, for an additional grant of lands to aid in the completion of the several lines of railroad and branches in that State mentioned in the act of Congress approved March 3, 1857, and for an extension of the time limited therein for the completion of the railroads; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DIXON presented the petition of Hillard Gladding, praying for an amendment of the Constitution of the United States forever prohibiting slavery; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHANDLER presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, in favor of a grant of land in aid of the construction of a harbor at the mouth of Ontonagon river, on the south shore of Lake Superior; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, in favor of a grant of land in aid of the construction of a ship-canal from Portage Lake to Lake Superior; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of William Crosswell, formerly in the naval service, for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORGAN presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, concurring in the resolutions of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, recommending an amendment to the Constitution of the United States imposing duties on exports; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of officers of the forty-fifth regiment United States colored troops, praying for the passage of a law authorizing the appointment of a brevet second lieutenant, with the pay of the grade, for each company of colored troops; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. NESMITH presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon in favor of the establishment of a branch mint at Portland in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HALE presented the memorial of Janes, Fowler, Kirtland & Co., of New York city, contractors to furnish material for the new dome of the Capitol, praying for additional compensation on their contract; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of senators and representatives of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, for an increase of the salaries of the judges of the district courts of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented a memorial of S. W. Macy, collector of customs at Newport, Rhode Island, praying that a steam whistle be placed on Castle Hill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the memorial of Edward Harris and others, citizens of Rhode Island, deprecating the enactment of a bankrupt law by Congress other than one purely prospective in its character. The memorialists set forth that while they have no objection to one that is prospective, they judge that a retrospective act, especially at this time, during the pendency of the war, would be injurious to the interests of the country. As the bill has been reported I move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 20, 1864, information in relation to the arrest of Colonel Richard T. Jacobs, Lieutenant Governor of the State of Kentucky, and Colonel Frank Wolford, one of the presidential electors of that State; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War communicating, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 10th of January, 1865, a list of officers of the regular Army, with a statement how they were employed on the 1st of January, 1865; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 6th of January, 1865, communications from Major General McDowell, commanding the department of the Pacific, in relation to a recent attempt to send arms and munitions of war out of that department to Mexico; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 418) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of members of Congress," approved August 16, 1856, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 705) for the relief of collectors and surveyors of customs in certain cases, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 38) directing the Secretary of the Interior to pay to the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatamie Indians, residing in Michigan, the sum of $192,850, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a petition of Janes, Fowler, Kirtland & Co., of New York, contractors to furnish the material and labor for the construction of the dome of the Capitol, praying for additional compensation on their contract, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 640) providing for a district and circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. The same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 374) supplementary to the same act, have instructed me to report them back and recommend that they be indefinitely postponed, their provisions being comprised in House bill No. 640, which I have just reported favorably.

No. 423) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof;" which was read, and passed to a second reading.

THANKS TO GENERAL SHERIDAN.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia to report back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 142) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Philip H. Sheridan and the officers and men under his command, and recommend its passage, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to tender the thanks of Congress to Major General Philip H. Sheridan and to the officers and men under his command for the gallantry, military skill, and courage displayed in the brilliant series of victories achieved by them in the valley of the Shenandoah, and especially for their services at Cedar Run, on the 19th of October, 1864, which retrieved the fortunes of the day and thus averted a great disaster.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the joint resolution (S. R. No. 16) submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States. A subsequent message announced that the resolution had been enrolled, and that the enrolled resolution had received the signature of the Speaker of the House. It was then signed by the Vice President, and transmitted to the President of the United States, who, by his Secretary, Mr. Nicolay, soon announced that it had been approved and signed by him.

RETURN OF ARKANSAS TO THE UNION.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to take up the joint resolution (S. R. No. 104) for the return of Arkansas to the Union, which I laid upon the table a few days ago, for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion to take up the joint resolution was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. In moving the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, I want to make a single statement. I am encouraged to send it to that committee from what I find in the report which they made at the last session on the question of admitting the gentlemen who then presented themselves as Senators from Arkansas. I did not at that time oppose that report, because I thought that it was premature to agitate the question; the subject was presented to us suddenly, and it was about the close of the session. There were various circumstances combined at that time why I thought Arkansas could not be received; but I am encouraged now to send this resolution to the committee, because in their report then, speaking of the fact that a majority of the voters did not participate in the election, they stated:

"This, however, would not be fatal to the reorganization, if all who were loyal to the Union had an opportunity to participate, and the State was free from military control. Such, however, is understood not to have been the case. The President had not then, nor has he up to this time, recalled his proclamation which declared the inhabitants of Arkansas in a state of insurrection against the United States."

I have drawn this resolution to meet that case, by authorizing the President to rescind that portion of his proclamation. The committee further state:

"When the rebellion in Arkansas shall have been so far suppressed that the loyal inhabitants thereof shall be free to reestablish their State government upon a republican foundation, or to recognize the one already set up, and by the aid and not in subordination to the military to maintain the same, they will then, and not before, in the opinion of your committee, be entitled to a representation in Congress, and to participate in the administration of the Federal Government."

All I desire to say is, that I think that state of things has now arrived. I have before me some evidence of that fact; which I propose to send to the committee. The best evidence that I can think of is the report of the military commander of that department. I know there are conflicting opinions in regard to the fact, but I think we are bound to take the best testimony. I have before me a communication from the commander of that department, and also from the late Provost Marshal General upon this very point, in relation to which I think the Senate, and perhaps the country, have labored under a misapprehension. The Provost Marshal General, in a letter to the President of the United States, says, speaking of the condition of Arkansas:

"At no time has it been so free from hostile trend, and it can be truly said that no portion of the territory in dispute is so thoroughly regained. I have to-day received my honorable discharge from the service, and I feel at liberty to make some statements to you which I could not so properly have done while in office, that bear directly on this point.

"I have filled the office of Provost Marshal General since the occupation of Little Rock until to-day, and have organized a very thorough system of secret service. The result of the information which has of late been obtained establishes conclusively the fact, that since the disastrous failure of General Price's raid the enemy had resolved on the abandonment of the State of Arkansas, and fixing their line of defense on Red river."

He goes on to state that at no time was the State so completely in the hands of the Union men and so completely recovered as at present.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate for one moment to the necessity of some action of this character. It is known to the Senate that under a law passed at the last session, and approved July 4, 1864, quartermasters, in procuring supplies in the States declared to be in insurrection, were not required to give vouchers. The Union man whose property is taken for the support of our Army cannot get pay for it in any of the districts that have been declared by the President to be in insurrection.

Let me say to the Senate, in this connection, that if we expect to cultivate a Union sentiment anywhere, especially in the districts that have been overrun by the rebellion, we must encourage the loyal men there; if we take their property we must pay for it; and we cannot pay for it under the law until that restriction is removed which declares this State, as well as others, in a state of insurrection. I have here a letter from Governor Murphy, in which he says that the citizens of Arkansas are preparing to go on their farms, raise crops, and make large improvements, but they are discouraged from doing so because everything they raise is liable to be taken to support the army at Fort Smith. We have always had a military post there; there is nothing new about that; but when their property is thus taken, under the restriction upon trade which was put into the act of July 4, 1864, they are not paid for it. I shall not occupy the time of the Senate by reading these communications, but I desire to have them referred, with the joint resolution, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. President, in my opinion the case of the State of Arkansas now commends itself to the Senate and to the country in a manner that it has never heretofore done. The Union men of Arkansas have suffered untold deprivations, and while we have extended the most cordial cooperation to the Union men of Missouri and Kansas, and the anti-slavery men all through the West and Southwest, we have left Arkansas alone. We have not even smiled upon her. We have hardly bidden her welcome when she has been struggling and making efforts to return to the Union and restore her government.

I want to say one thing more. This restored government of Arkansas ought not to be prejudiced on account of any convictions individuals may have in regard to the amnesty proclamation. I know that a portion of the Senate, as well as of the country, conceive the idea that every State ought to come back under some general law, and that we ought not to take back one State at a time. My conviction is that the government in each State should be restored and should stand upon its own merits, and that we cannot make any general law for the return of these States any more than we can make a general law for the admission of new Territories.

It is nothing new to have a State government protected by the military authority. When this subject comes up properly before the Senate I shall undertake to prove that the military authorities did not establish this State government, and consequently it was not established under the proclamation of the President of the 8th of December, 1863. It was a movement of the people. They commenced this movement on the 30th of October, and the President's proclamation was not issued until the 8th of December. There was a contest about it. When the President did issue his proclamation, he set the 28th of January as the day of election; but after he found the people were moving he submitted the whole matter to them. I will read a letter which the President himself wrote, in January, 1864, addressed to Hon. William M. Fishback. He says:

"When I fixed a plan for an election in Arkansas, I did it in ignorance that your convention was at the same work. Since I learned the latter fact I have been constantly trying to yield my plan to theirs. I have sent two letters to General Steele, and three or four dispatches to you and others, saying that he (General Steele) must be master, but that it will probably be best for him to keep the convention on its own plan."

So the President himself yielded the point in his proclamation, and allowed the election to be held and the convention to be organized according to the plan marked out by the people, and it was so organized. I have all the documents in the case, and I ask to have them referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the hope that this joint resolution will be favorably considered, and an early report made upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order to refer will be made.

REPRESENTATION IN ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College, have instructed me to report the resolution back to the Senate with a recommendation that the resolution pass, and with an amendment to the preamble. I will ask for the consideration of the resolution at this time as the electoral votes are to be counted a week from to-day, and it may avoid difficulty in the canvass of the votes if the two Houses take action in regard to this matter prior to that time. No change is made in the House resolution; it is in print on Senators' tables, and they can see at once what it is.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution; which was read, as follows:

Whereas the inhabitants and local authorities of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee rebelled against the Government of the United States, and have continued in a state of armed rebellion for more than three years, and were in said state of armed rebellion on the 8th day of November, 1864: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the States mentioned in the preamble to this joint resolution are not entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President and Vice President of the United States for the term of office commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865; and no electoral votes shall be received or counted from said States concerning the choice of President and Vice President for said term of office.

The amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was to strike out of the preamble the following words:

And have continued in a state of armed rebellion for more than three years, and were in said state of armed rebellion on the 8th day of November, 1864.

And to insert the following in lieu thereof:

And were in such state of rebellion on the 8th day of November, 1864, that no valid election for President and Vice President of the United States according to the Constitution and laws thereof was held therein on said day.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Is this a proper time to move an amendment to that amendment as reported by the committee?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Then I move to strike out the word "Louisiana" in the preamble.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not part of the amendment of the committee. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's amendment would now be in order.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I move to strike out of the preamble the word "Louisiana." I will simply state that it is a matter of history that the State of Louisiana has reorganized, or at least attempted to do so, and in the opinion of many, and perhaps most, of the loyal citizens of that State, has reorganized as a State. It is a matter of history that they have elected State officers and a State Legislature; that they have elected members to a constitutional convention and framed a new constitution for that State; that that Legislature passed a law authorizing the election of electors for President and Vice President of the United States in the last presidential election, and that such electors have met and cast their votes. Under these circumstances I think there is a striking distinction between the State of Virginia and the State of Louisiana. My object in moving this amendment is, under this state of facts, that some opportunity may be afforded to a loyal people who have suffered all the horrors of the rebellion, who have got the better of it, and put it under foot, of coming back and resuming their place in the councils of the nation.

SENATORS FROM NEVADA.

Mr. CONNESS. With the consent of the Senate, I wish to present the credentials of Hon. James W. Nye and Hon. William M. Stewart, Senators-elect from the State of Nevada. I ask that they be read and placed on file, and that the oath of office be administered to the Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a question pending.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to allow this to be done.

Mr. SUMNER. It is a privileged question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair it is a question of privilege.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire this subject to lie over until to-morrow. I promise the Senator from California that I will not ask any further postponement than to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator submit any motion?

Mr. TRUMBULL. These being Senators from a new State, it will be necessary to classify them and that they draw lots for the terms which they are to serve. I merely wish to inquire whether the arrangements have been made for that classification?

Mr. McDougall. I suppose that will be in order after the Senators have taken the oath of office. They will then be classified as Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will inform the Senator from Illinois and the Senate that the necessary preparations have been made, and the classification can be made whenever the oath of office shall be administered. The credentials will be read.

The Secretary read the credentials.

Mr. DAVIS. I regret that I had not known yesterday that the credentials of these gentlemen were to be presented to-day. If I had, I should have interposed no objection to the matter being acted upon at this time, and I will merely state my reason for making a request now for postponement.

I think, sir, it is a correct principle that no State, or no Territory assuming the forms of a State, can elect members to the Senate until such State be admitted into the Union; that no State can be admitted into the Union by any other authority than by the act of Congress; that it takes the action of Congress to admit a new State into the Union, and no other power or authority under the Government can do that act.

This State has not yet been admitted into the Union by an act of Congress. Until Congress has performed that act in due form I hold that it is not competent for the Legislature of Nevada to elect members to the Senate. That being the position which I believe to be the true constitutional principle, I was anxious, desirous, at least, to have had an opportunity to examine the precedents.

I merely state the reason, Mr. President, why I should prefer that the qualification of these gentlemen, if they are to be qualified as Senators, should be postponed until to-morrow. I will not ask a postponement for a longer time. By that time I promise to be ready with such precedents as I think pertinent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator submit a motion?

Mr. DAVIS. I submit a motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In regard to the election of Senators by a State before it has been formally admitted by Congress, the precedents have settled that question. Senators have been admitted uniformly from States which have organized their State governments and elected their Senators before the State was formally admitted.

Mr. CONNESS. Under an enabling act.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, under an enabling act. It has been done in numerous cases. The question has been up once since I have been in the Senate. However upon original principles it might have been decided, where the Legislature of a newly-formed State has elected Senators, although the election has taken place before the State was formally admitted, the Senators have always been admitted to their seats, and the Senator from Kentucky will find that to be the case when he looks into the precedents. It has been uniformly so. I am not aware, however, whether the Senators in the present case were elected before the State was formally in the Union or not, nor is it material.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to explain?

Mr. JOHNSON. It was after the State was admitted by the President's proclamation.

Mr. CONNESS. It was after the State was admitted by the proclamation of the President, under the enabling act preceding the organization.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It would be immaterial, according to the uniform practice of the Senate, whether it was so or not; but it seems in point of fact the Senators in this instance were elected after the State was formally admitted. The enabling act authorized the President to make proclamation declaring when this State was admitted. Nevada is a State admitted into the Union under the authority of Congress.

Mr. CONNESS. That proclamation, I will state, was issued by the President on the 31st of October.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am aware that that proclamation has been issued, and by looking at the law authorizing Nevada to form a State constitution and be admitted into the Union it will be found that on complying with the provisions of the law it is made the duty of the President "to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action whatever on the part of Congress." There is the law; there is the act of Congress declaring what the people of Nevada should do in order to entitle themselves to become a State of the Union, declaring that when these acts were performed it should be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation making known the facts, and thereupon the State should be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States without any further action whatever on the part of Congress.

This has been done before. This is not the first State that has been admitted into the Union in pursuance of an act of Congress on the proclamation of the President where the facts had transpired which the act required. There can be no question, I apprehend, that these Senators are entitled to be sworn as members of the Senate, there being no objection to their credentials; I trust, therefore, the Senator from Kentucky will not persist in his motion to postpone the swearing in of the gentlemen who have presented themselves; and if he does persist in it, I think the Senate ought not to allow the motion to prevail. It is a question of privilege; the Senators come here strictly in pursuance of law, and are entitled to be sworn.

Mr. DAVIS. It is a matter of the utmost indifference to me what disposition the Senate makes of my objection. Still I make the objection, and I adhere to it. I was aware of the law which authorized the President to announce by his proclamation that Nevada was in the Union. I believe that that portion of the act of Congress and that proclamation of the President had no legitimate effect whatever. The admission of a new State into the Union is a congressional act, and there is no power that can perform that act but Congress. Congress, according to my principle of the Constitution, cannot delegate to the President of the United States the power to admit a new State into the Union. It would be as competent and as regular, in my judgment, for Congress to delegate to the President the power to legislate upon an ordinary subject as by its act to delegate to the President power to admit a State into the Union.

I know, sir, that this objection will avail nothing; I do not expect it to avail anything; but I make it merely that it may be upon the record.

I assume this further position, that where there is a plain, constitutional principle, no precedents can abolish that constitutional principle; I do not care if they were counted by thousands instead of by twos and threes. Where the Constitution prescribes by its express language that new States shall be admitted into the Union by Congress, I hold that it is utterly incompetent for Congress to delegate the power to the President to admit a State into the Union by his proclamation; that the State does not and cannot come legitimately into the Union until and after Congress has passed a law to that effect.

Now, sir, in relation to enabling acts and the admissions of States that have elected members of the two Houses under enabling acts before Congress admitted those States into the Union, I hold that all such precedents are utterly void and inoperative. The Government of the United States is not a Government of development; it is not a Government of precedent in relation to the functions of Congress where those functions are expressly and by letter declared. When the Constitution provides that Congress shall admit new States into the Union, whatever precedents there may be to prove that other modes of admitting States into the Union than by the legislation of Congress had been adopted and had been sanctioned by the action of Congress, those precedents cannot repeal nor abolish the express provision of the Constitution, and cannot overrule one of its principles by force of precedent. I have nothing more to say in relation to this matter.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, if this were an original question, I should feel compelled to differ with the Senator from Kentucky; but it is not an original question; it has been more than once decided by the Senate and by the other branch of Congress. The Constitution provides, as we all know, that States may be admitted into the Union with the assent of Congress; and Congress has heretofore done what was done in this case, provided that when a constitution shall have been formed by the people of a Territory it shall be in the power of the President by proclamation to state that all the conditions of the enabling act have been complied with, and that the State itself is at once a State in the Union. And it has been the received opinion, I think, of most of the members of the profession—there are always differences of opinion among us; nobody knows that better than the honorable member from Kentucky—it has been the received opinion that that is a mode by which Congress can legitimately assent to a State's introduction into the Union. What she can do by herself directly she can do almost as directly by making the admission of the State to depend upon the happening of a contingency, and providing that the President shall by proclamation state that the contingency has occurred.

Mr. FOOT. It was done in the case of Missouri.

Mr. JOHNSON. It was done in the case of Missouri. We are all acquainted with the history of her admission, and how finally a joint resolution was passed by Congress, March 2, 1821, which provided for her admission upon a certain condition to be performed by the people of the State; and on the 10th of August, 1821, the President issued the proclamation declaring the admission of Missouri to be complete according to law.

So in the case of Michigan; although the act for the admission of Michigan was not passed by Congress and approved by the President until January 26, 1837, her first Senators commenced their term of service by an election on the 10th of November, 1835, as will be found by reference to the table of senatorial terms appended to Hickley's Constitution. So in the case of California; the State was not admitted until September, 1850; and immediately upon her admission Senators were received who had been elected nearly a year before in anticipation of the admission of the State. In the case of Oregon, and in that of Minnesota, both recent instances, the Senators were admitted to their seats on elections which took place before the act was passed which admitted the State.

There are these instances, and perhaps others, where Senators have been elected in advance of the admission of the State into the Union, either by Congress directly or by the President's proclamation issued in pursuance of authority invested in him by Congress. They have always been received without any objection, the admission of the State by Congress afterward bringing the State in as a State of the Union from the time the constitution was adopted by the people; and as the election of Senators and of Representatives by the people of those States was of course subsequent to the actual formation of the constitution, they have been considered as necessarily included in the action which Congress thereafter took admitting the States into the Union.

It seems to me therefore very clear, both upon the point of principle, considering it as an original question, and upon the ground of authority, that the honorable members from Nevada are entitled to admission at once. It is true that my friend from Kentucky is right in saying that this is a Government constituted by the organic law itself and is not a Government of precedents; but it is equally true in relation to the Constitution as to any law which may be passed, that what the proper authorities of the nation have from time to time decided is the meaning of the Constitution is to be received in after times as the meaning, or we shall never know what the Constitution is. The principle applies equally to proceedings by Congress itself as it does to cases which may occur in the courts of the United States or in the State courts. What is decided to be the meaning of the Constitution by the competent authority, and especially if it has been done by a series of decisions, is ever to be considered as the true meaning of the Constitution.

The motion to postpone was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senators proposing to qualify will please step forward.

The Senators-elect were conducted to the Vice President's chair by Mr. CONNESS, and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. NYE and Mr. STEWART, they took their seats in the Senate.

Mr. FOOT. I offer the usual resolution providing for the classification of the two Senators just admitted to their seats:

Resolved, That the Senate proceed to ascertain the classes in which the Senators from the State of Nevada shall be inserted, in conformity with the resolution of the 14th of May, 1789, and as the Constitution requires.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, it was Ordered, That the Secretary put into the ballot-box two papers of equal size, one of which shall be numbered one, and the other shall be numbered three; each of the Senators from the State of Nevada shall draw out one paper; and the Senator who shall draw out the paper numbered one shall be inserted in the class of Senators whose term of service will expire on the 3d day of March, 1869; and the Senator who shall draw out the paper numbered three shall be inserted in the class of Senators whose term of service will expire on the 3d day of March, 1867.

Two papers were accordingly put into the ballot-box; the Senators from Nevada advanced to the Secretary's desk, and each drew one paper. Mr. STEWART drew the paper numbered one, and was placed in the class of Senators whose terms will expire March 3, 1869. Mr. NYE drew the paper numbered three, and was placed in the class of Senators whose terms will expire March 3, 1867.

REPRESENTATION IN ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

Mr. HALE. I move now to take up the resolution of inquiry which I submitted yesterday.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have the resolution I offered yesterday taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a question now before the Senate, and it is extremely unpleasant to the Chair and not promotive of the dispatch of business to be continually doing business out of order. The joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the pending question is on an amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. TEN EYCK,] and that Senator was upon the floor when interrupted by the proceeding which has just taken place.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I had said all that I intended to say at this time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we had best dispose of the question under consideration before passing to any other. It is important to settle at an early day the mode of counting the votes for President and Vice President, which, under the Constitution and laws, are to be opened and canvassed a week from to-day in joint session of the two Houses. It is known probably to every member of the Senate that no rules have ever been adopted for action in that joint convention. I recollect that in 1856, when Mr. Buchanan was elected, there was a question in regard to the electoral vote of the State of Wisconsin. The law requires that the electors shall meet at the capitals of their respective States and cast their votes for President and Vice President on a particular day. The electors of the State of Wisconsin were prevented by a severe snow storm in that State from reaching the capital on the day fixed by law to cast their votes for President and Vice President. They, however, reached it on the subsequent day, and cast the vote. When the vote of the State of Wisconsin was opened in joint session of the two Houses, the question was immediately raised, was the vote of that State entitled to be counted, it not having been cast on the day prescribed by law? and there was no mode of settling it. Some insisted that that was a question to be decided by the joint convention then in session voting per capita, each Senator counting as one Representative. Others insisted that the Senate must withdraw, and that no question which should arise in regard to the counting of a vote could be settled in any other way than by the concurrent action of the two Houses, each acting separately. The matter was finally disposed of, without deciding that question, by declaring that if the vote of the State of Wisconsin was counted the total vote would stand thus and so; and if it was not counted it would stand thus and so; but that in either event James Buchanan and John C. Breckinridge, whether you counted the vote of Wisconsin or not, had received a majority of all the electoral votes, and were therefore declared elected President and Vice President of the United States.

Now, sir, we are likely to have similar questions arise when the votes cast at the recent presidential election shall be counted a week from to-day. It is known as a matter of public notoriety in the country that several of the States included in the President's proclamation of 1861, I think Arkansas, Tennessee, and Louisiana, have cast electoral votes. There is a question as to the authority of these States to vote for President and Vice President, in consequence of the insurrection which prevailed there on the 8th of November last, when the election took place, and the House of Representatives has passed this joint resolution declaring that the votes of certain States, naming them, shall not be counted. This resolution is accompanied with a preamble which the Committee on the Judiciary have moved to amend, and now the Senator from New Jersey moves further to amend the preamble by striking out the word "Louisiana," thereby deciding that the vote of Louisiana shall be counted.

It is a matter of notoriety to the whole country, and is certainly known to every member of the Senate, that it will not affect the result one way or the other whether the vote from Louisiana be counted or not; but if we decide to receive the vote from Louisiana it will be a decision by the Congress of the United States that the State of Louisiana was in such a condition as to vote for President and Vice President on the 8th of November last.

The Committee on the Judiciary by the amendment they have reported propose to alter the preamble somewhat. The object of this alteration is to avoid as far as possible any commitment upon the subject which the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey brings up. The object of the amendment of the committee is simply to put the preamble in such form that if it is adopted and the resolution passed, Congress will not have decided whether Louisiana is in the Union or out of the Union, whether she is a State or not a State. It will be time enough to decide that question when it is presented to us. If our amendment is adopted, we place the resolution upon the ground that the condition of things on the 8th day of November last, the day of the presidential election, was such in all these States that no election was held according to the Constitution and laws of the United States. The preamble, if amended as we propose, will read:

Whereas the inhabitants and local authorities of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee rebelled against the Government of the United States, and were in such state of rebellion on the 8th day of November, 1864, that no valid election for electors of President and Vice President of the United States according to the Constitution and laws thereof was held therein on said day.

And therefore it is declared that the States mentioned in the preamble are not entitled to representation in the Electoral College. That will be the form of the preamble if the Senate shall concur in the amendment recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to inquire of the Senator if there is any report from the Committee on the Judiciary accompanying this joint resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is not.

Mr. HOWE. No statement of facts?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No statement of facts. This is a House resolution, and I am not aware that there was any report accompanying it from the House committee. There certainly was none before the committee of this body, and we made no written report on the subject.

Now, sir, in regard to the State of Louisiana, whatever may be the view of Senators as to the organization which we understand has been gotten up in that State, and although Congress may perhaps hereafter think proper to recognize that organization as legitimate, it does not necessarily follow that the condition of things in the State of Louisiana on the 8th of November last was such as to authorize us to count the vote cast there for President and Vice President; and why? It is a matter of public notoriety known to every child in the land, that a large portion of the State of Louisiana on the 8th of November last was in the possession of a hostile enemy. There was no opportunity to vote for President and Vice President in a very considerable portion of that State; and it might be a very serious question whether when the half of a State or the third of a State was overrun by an enemy, an election held under such circumstances and under the auspices of our own guns, would be an election which would authorize the Congress of the United States when in joint convention it comes to canvass the votes for President and Vice President, to count votes cast under such circumstances.

In our action on this question I do not mean to commit the Senate one way or the other in regard to the organization which has been gotten up in the State of Louisiana; and it was with that very view that the committee moved to amend the preamble. I trust that the State of Louisiana will not be stricken out. I think if we strike that out and decide to receive the electoral vote cast in that State on the 8th of November last, we do decide directly that there was a State government there, and that there was an election for electors for President and Vice President in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States. Now, I do not believe that. I think such was not the fact. There could be no election according to the laws and Constitution of the United States in the State of Louisiana when a very considerable portion of that State was overrun by the enemy, and the legal voters had no opportunity to vote one way or the other. I am not advised how many votes were cast at the election on the 8th of November. No evidence has been submitted showing how many were cast.

Again, sir, the President of the United States, in pursuance of an act of Congress declared the inhabitants of the State of Louisiana to be in a state of insurrection against the Government of the United States. We passed a law authorizing him to issue the proclamation declaring that fact. In pursuance of the law the proclamation was issued. That proclamation has never been recalled. According to the law of the land, according to the proclamation of the President, the inhabitants of the State of Louisiana are to-day in a state of insurrection against the Government of the United States. Can you receive a vote cast by the inhabitants of a State for Chief Magistrate of the Union, when your own laws declare and your executive proclamation declares that they are in a state of insurrection against the Government of the United States? Sir, until there shall be some action by Congress recognizing the organization which has been set up in Louisiana, we ought not in my judgment to count electoral votes from that State. Whether we shall recognize that organization or not, I will not undertake to say. We have not done so yet; and until we do it we ought not to count the electoral vote. I trust, therefore, that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will not prevail.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I am aware, sir, that this is a very delicate and important question, and it was with a great deal of diffidence that I undertook to propose an amendment to the resolution. I know that questions of such grave importance as the one now before the Senate ought to be considered calmly and coolly, and upon a great deal of reflection, and perhaps the wisest course in general would be to remain quiet, rather than to throw before the Senate for its hasty consideration a matter of such vital importance. But, sir, I hold to the doctrine that none of these States can be out of the Union; that having taken up their lot and part with their sister States at the time they were admitted into the Union, they are not now legally out of the Union; their governments have been in abeyance; they have been overrun by the feet of hostile armies, and many of their citizens have by usurpation and in violation of their duty to their fellow-men and to their God attempted to carry these States out of the Union.

That being my opinion, whenever the testimony is furnished to my mind that these States thus in the Union have, by the aid of the General Government, or by the efforts of their own people, or by the act of both combined, reestablished themselves, so to speak, or set their State governments in action anew and have commenced again to revolve in their old orbits, I shall feel it to be my duty, so far as I am concerned, to extend to them all the privileges and all the rights which the loyal people of a loyal State are entitled to at the hands of their sister States, whether upon this floor or anywhere else. It was simply in that view and aspect of the case that I made the motion to amend the preamble of this joint resolution, for the purpose of excluding from the operation and effect of the resolution the State of Louisiana, judging and believing from the testimony which is notorious throughout the country, and which has come to the knowledge, I apprehend, of the Senate through various channels, that the present condition of the State of Louisiana is such as I have just stated. I can well see that there is a propriety in passing some such joint resolution as this in relation to States that are manifestly in the condition alluded to in its preamble; States that are in rebellion or such a condition of rebellion as that no election could be held or was held for the purposes that are requisite to establish them as a State; States that are not in the exercise of the ordinary constitutional powers of a State.

The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary states that it was the desire of a majority of the committee to avoid a commitment on this subject. It would not perhaps be amiss to insist that a commitment shall not be had against the interest of the State any more than in its favor. The Senator says that the adoption of the amendment proposed by myself will be a declaration by Congress that the State of Louisiana was in a condition to perform all the functions of a State government and to appoint State officers and Senators and members of the national House of Representatives. I admit that that question is involved in this amendment; but the same question is involved in the resolution, and it will be determined against the State if this joint resolution passes as it stands, for you will then decide that this State is now, this day, in a state of rebellion such as to deprive it of all the powers, rights, and privileges of the State of Louisiana. I am not prepared to go to that extent.

Now, sir, what is the present condition of that State, so far as it regards the question of its being in a state of rebellion? According to the best information that can be derived from various sources, from the action of the State itself, from various memorials, papers, and documents that have come into the possession of the Senate and have been published by its order, it appears that nearly a year ago, or perhaps quite a year ago, an election was held in Louisiana for State officers, and a very large number of votes were cast at that election, about two thirds or approximating to two thirds of the largest number of votes that had been cast at any former election for State officers in the State.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator is certainly under a misapprehension with reference to the statements we received in committee. No such vote as that has been cast. There may have been perhaps two thirds of the former votes of those localities that voted, but not two thirds of the vote of the State.

Mr. TEN EYCK. There were eleven thousand four hundred and fourteen votes cast at that election.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There have been upward of fifty thousand votes cast in the State.

Mr. TEN EYCK. It was stated that a large number of the former voters had gone into rebellion or the rebel army, and a great many had been killed. I may be in error in relation to the statement as to the number of votes cast in the whole State. This election of which I now speak, together with the election for members of a constitutional convention, and all the other elections in the State, were free and uninterrupted, without the interference of any military control whatever. Indeed, it has been stated by a person who was upon the ground and whose attention was called to it, that "no effort whatever was made on the part of the military authorities to influence the citizens of the State, either in the selection of candidates or in the election of officers, and that the direct influence of the Government of the United States was less in Louisiana than in the elections probably of any State of the Union; that the officers representing the Government, both civil and military, were divided, so far as they entertained or expressed opinions, on the question of candidates and upon the policy pursued in the organization of the Government."

It seems that here was an election held by the people of that State, and there have been since several elections held by those people for several purposes, and if any military influence was exerted it was merely in aid of them, and that the civil authority was not at all in subordination to the military.

Under these circumstances, and in view of the invitation that has been held out by the Government to all the loyal people of these States to come back and endeavor to organize themselves anew, when the loyal people who have come through the fire and blood of this contest, and gained sufficient strength to present themselves civilly and quietly at the ballot to choose their own State officers and to choose delegates to form a new State constitution, and when they claim the rights of other States, are they to be met by the plea that upon certain out-bounds of the State there still may be the tread of rebel feet? Why, sir, it appears by all the testimony that the population and business and property of the State of Louisiana are confined to the cities and districts of country immediately bordering upon the river, and that the residue of the State is very sparsely settled indeed, with very few inhabitants, such portion of the country as is not submerged by water being used for planting purposes, and that the property and population are condensed within very small spaces which are within the control of the United States and the loyal people of that State whose anxiety and desire is to return to the United States Government and to support it and its authority.

Sir, I could have desired that the people of this State should have a much more able and earnest advocate than I am; but under the circumstances I have felt it my duty to raise the question.

Mr. POWELL. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to ask him a question.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I shall conclude presently, and then I shall be happy to answer your questions if it be in my power. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has stated that there was no evidence as to how many votes were cast at the election for electors of President and Vice President of the United States. Why, sir, the electors of President and Vice President were chosen by the members of the Legislature in accordance with a law passed by themselves for that purpose, fixing a day for that election by a prior vote. In consequence of the authority contained in that law the election was held. I believe it is not illegal on account of its having been held in that way, although that course has not been usual for many years.

Another objection is made on the ground that the President of the United States has declared this State to be in a condition of insurrection and rebellion, and therefore all its acts tending toward a return to the Union are to be disregarded until the President shall withdraw his proclamation. If that be the test and criterion, all that the Executive has to do, or if we had been so unfortunate as to fail in the reelection of the present incumbent of the presidential chair, and his antagonist had been elected, and he should see fit to refuse to withdraw the proclamation declaring a State to be in insurrection, he could keep a State thus circumstanced and thus situated for all time, or at least during the whole period of his administration, from returning to the Union, although every individual soul within its limits might be desirous and anxious to return to their ancient loyalty.

Sir, I do not mean to continue this discussion; it is most important in its consequences; but it appeared to me that we were in danger of committing ourselves to a policy that will be more injurious to us by excluding the vote of the State of Louisiana, as is proposed, than by admitting it. Having said thus much, I submit the amendment to the better judgment and discretion of the Senate without intending to prolong the debate.

Mr. HOWE. As I propose to vote for the amendment moved by the Senator from New Jersey, and as the reasons which will control my vote are widely different from those which he has stated as controlling his own, perhaps the Senate will pardon me a very few minutes in stating what my own views are.

I shall vote to strike out the State of Louisiana from this preamble and resolution, and in doing so I am not controlled at all by the consideration of how many citizens of Louisiana participated in that election in the choice of electors. I am governed by the single fact that a statute of your own, existing at the time of that election, declared that the people of that State had the right to choose electors, and that certain of them did participate in making that choice. The Senator from Illinois says but a small portion of the people of the State participated in that choice. Your statute said that all might. Does the refusal of a large portion or a small portion of the people of a State to participate in an election deprive the minority, if you please, no matter how small, of their right under your statute? If the refusal of any portion or the inability of any portion of the people to participate in an election deprives the remainder of the right they have under existing laws, tell me what is the number whose disability or whose neglect or whose refusal imposes this disfranchisement on the residue? Is it a majority? Is it the people of half the State? Is it the people of ten counties? Is it the people of a single county? My own idea about it is, that when the existing law gives to the people of a particular locality a right, that right is to be exercised, in the absence of local restrictions, by just so many of the people as see fit to participate in it.

There is one fact, Mr. President, which existed in the State of Louisiana, which exists in the State of Virginia, and in South Carolina, and each one of the seceded States, which, in my judgment, has authorized the Congress of the United States to repeal that act which gave those people the right to participate in the choice of a President, and to participate in the legislation of the United States. It authorized the Congress of the United States to repeal that law, and authorized nobody else. That fact, which I think conferred that authority upon us, is the fact of a rebellion, which (although we are told over and over again that it did not take the State of Louisiana, or any of those States out of the Union) did destroy every semblance of an American State. I know it did not take the territory out of the Union, out of the rightful jurisdiction of the United States, but that rebellion was just as fatal to any such thing as an American State, as Louisiana had been, as a bullet through the heart would be fatal to the man. There is the form of a man, but the life of the man is not there; it is a carcass. To have an American State you must have a community not only with governors and legislators and local courts, but you must have a community interlaced, as it were, with national tribunals and organization; you must have a community in which Federal courts and Federal organs, collectors, and postmasters, and the like, exist, and are allowed to act; and when these Federal organs are destroyed, that State, as an American State, within the definition of the Constitution, is ended. I do not care whether you call it out of the Union or in, an American State is not there; and when that happens, inasmuch as it is obligatory on you who wield national authority to furnish government of some kind for all your people, I think the event has happened (and I have said so once in reference to the State of Arkansas) which not only authorizes you, but in some sort demands of you that you step in and furnish a government, and a civil government, for the community so placed. Hitherto we have refused to do that, and the law, as it stood on your statute-book in November last, authorized these people to participate in the choice of a President. Some of them, I do not care whether a dozen or fifty, did participate, and I think it is too late to disfranchise them.

I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, because I understand that Louisiana did make choice of electors. I understand that two other States have also chosen electors. I should vote for an amendment to strike them out of the resolution. It is no time, and I have no disposition to argue the question; I simply wished to occupy the time of the Senate long enough to state, so far as there was a difference between the views which governed my action and those which have been laid down by the Senator from New Jersey, that difference.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from New Jersey seems to suppose that a refusal to count the electoral vote from Louisiana settles the question just as much against the present State organization in Louisiana as the counting of the vote would settle the question in favor of that State organization. Cannot the Senator from New Jersey conceive of a case where a State might be perfect in all its State organization and yet its electoral vote be rejected? Then it does not decide it so completely. Here was a case from Wisconsin. Nobody supposed that the State of Wisconsin had not a right to vote for President; but there were many who supposed that her vote, not being in accordance with law, not being cast at the proper time, ought not to be counted. I will not undertake to say who was right in reference to it; but, if we had refused to count that vote, we should not thereby have decided that there was no such State as Wisconsin.

Mr. TEN EYCK. That might be a perfect answer to what I suggested on this subject, if the reason were not assigned in the preamble why these electoral votes should not be counted. The reason assigned in the preamble, as I understand it, is that the State is in such a condition of rebellion that no election could be had. I said that passing this resolution with that preamble would establish, so far as Congress could establish that fact, the status of Louisiana before the country and before the civilized world.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it would establish no such principle. A civil commotion or insurrection might exist among the people of a State, so that no election could be held; and yet the State organization might not be questioned by anybody. The State organization might be loyal and true to the Union, notwithstanding a foreign enemy had come into Louisiana; and I will put that case as a complete answer to the Senator's suggestion. Suppose this had been a foreign war, and a foreign enemy had taken possession of the State of Louisiana, and held such possession that no election could be held throughout the State. I want to know if the Senator from New Jersey would count the electoral vote from that State when not twenty men could have assembled in the State and voted for President and Vice President? If we so decided, would that say that the organization of the State of Louisiana was not to be recognized, and was repudiated?

The preamble to the resolution states (and that was the object of amending it) first the fact that the inhabitants and local authorities of certain States were in a State of insurrection. Does the Senator from New Jersey doubt that? Does he propose to count the vote from South Carolina? Why not? Because it is in a state of insurrection, I suppose. That was once the condition of Louisiana. Then what other fact is stated? That such a state of things existed on the 8th day of November, 1864, that no valid election according to the laws and Constitution of the United States could be held in the State. We do not decide that the State organization which has been inaugurated there may not be a valid one. We meet that question, and will have to meet it when we come to investigate the right to seats of the gentlemen who have presented themselves here as Senators from the State of Louisiana. We may admit those gentlemen to seats, and yet such a state of things may have existed in Louisiana on the day of the election in November last as would not authorize us to count the electoral vote of that State. I think, therefore, the Senator is mistaken in supposing that we decide as much by excluding the vote as we do by receiving it. If we receive the electoral vote of Louisiana, we do decide that she was in a condition to cast her electoral vote at that time, that she had her State government, and that an election was held there in pursuance to the laws and Constitution of the United States.

Now let me say a word in reply to what was said by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe,] who I am sorry is not in his seat. He says he is for receiving the vote of the State of Louisiana because your statute said the people should have the right to vote. I would like to see the statute that said the people of Louisiana had a right to vote at the last presidential election. I can show the Senator the statute of the Congress of the United States that says that the President should have authority to declare, in an existing state of facts, the inhabitants of certain States in insurrection against the Government of the United States; and if there is any statute authorizing the people of a State to vote for President of the United States, this act, so far as it is inconsistent with it, repeals it; it is the last law on the subject; and in pursuance of this act of Congress the President has issued his proclamation and has said that the inhabitants of the State of Louisiana were in a state of insurrection against the Government of the United States.

But, says the Senator from New Jersey, has Congress, then, put it out of its power ever to reinstate these States in their proper position toward the Federal Government, and does it depend upon the recalling by the President of the United States of his proclamation? By no means. Congress may repeal the law under which the President issued his proclamation, and then what becomes of the proclamation based upon the law? Suppose some person were elected President who desired unjustly to keep these States from representation in the Congress of the United States, or from voting at a presidential election, and refused to recall his proclamation when the insurrection was suppressed and the rebellion put down; Congress has only to repeal the law by virtue of which the President issued his proclamation, and the proclamation falls. There is nothing in that position.

The Senator from Wisconsin asks, is the refusal of a portion of the people to vote to be a reason for not receiving the vote of a State? Not at all; but I will tell you what is a reason for refusing the vote of a State: when the people of that State have had no opportunity to vote. That is the question. Have the people of Louisiana—and is there a Senator who believes they have—had an opportunity to vote, unrestrained by military authority, unawed by hostile armies, for President and Vice President of the United States? Does the Senator from New Jersey believe it? If a large portion of the inhabitants of any State of this Union have had no opportunity to vote, I want to know if the vote of a township or a county shall be taken as a vote of a State for President? The refusal to vote when they had an opportunity would be no reason for excluding the vote of a State; but the want of opportunity to vote and to exercise the franchise to which the inhabitants of a State are entitled would be a reason for not receiving the vote of the balance.

I am not furnished with the facts in regard to the number of votes cast in Louisiana at the presidential election; but I know, generally, that a large portion of the State of Louisiana in territorial extent, I think I may say three fourths of the State, on the 8th of November last, was in the possession of the enemies of the United States, and no person could have cast a vote within that jurisdiction. The largest vote ever cast there under any of these organizations was some eleven or twelve thousand, while the vote of the State, when all her legal voters had the privilege of going to the polls, was more than sixty thousand.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Fifty-one thousand, I can state to the Senator, was the highest vote ever cast, and the average vote of the State was thirty-four thousand.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I thought it was sixty thousand.

Mr. TEN EYCK. No, sir; the highest vote ever cast was fifty-one thousand, and the average was thirty-four thousand.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It may be so; I have not the figures before me; but eleven or twelve thousand is but a small part of fifty-one thousand. But, sir, I do not place it upon that ground. I should agree entirely with the Senator from Wisconsin if his facts were right; if the voters of Louisiana had the opportunity to vote, the refusal of a portion to vote constitutes no reason why the vote of the State should not be received.

But, sir, I do not desire to prolong the debate. I do not, at this stage, want to go into a discussion of the question, and we are not yet prepared to act upon the question as to the organization in the State of Louisiana. There are many facts connected with the settlement of that question, and we are not fully advised as to the facts. The Committee on the Judiciary has been considering it, and has bestowed much attention upon it. But here is a question that is pressed upon us at once, that must be decided within the week. However the question of the State organization of Louisiana may ultimately be decided, (which I do not wish to prejudge; about which at this time I wish to express no opinion,) the Committee on the Judiciary thought it was proper to concur in the resolution of the House of Representatives, and not count the electoral vote from the State of Louisiana. I trust the Senate will concur in the resolution and settle this question, and avoid any difficulty in canvassing the vote, without committing ourselves one way or the other as to the ultimate decision in regard to the organization which has been inaugurated in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. HARRIS. I think it is to be very much regretted, Mr. President, that this question, which affects the admission of the members of Congress from Louisiana to both Houses, should be thus incidentally brought before the Senate. I would much prefer to have the same course adopted by Congress in counting these votes which it is said was adopted in the case of Wisconsin at a previous election. We all know that whether the votes of these States, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee, are counted or not, it will not affect the result. It was so in the case of Wisconsin. It seems to me it would be far better to say in this case, as was said then, "If we count the votes of these States the number of votes for Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Johnson will be so many; if we reject these votes the number of votes will be so many; and in either case these candidates are elected;" and thus pass over this question.

Sir, the more I reflect upon it the more difficulty I see in the way of adopting any such resolution as this. It was not discussed in the committee; but my reflection has led me to think there is great importance in the question; that it is a very grave question. I ask the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, what right has Congress to say by a resolution passed by a majority of each House that the State of New York shall not be represented in counting these votes? Why may you not include in the preamble to this resolution, and in the resolution itself, the State of New York as well as these other States? I ask the chairman of the committee to tell me how he can distinguish between them. If Congress has the power to declare that Louisiana shall not vote, why has it not the power to declare that New York shall not vote? It seems to me that is a very serious question. There is no need of settling such a question here. We can pass over it without any difficulty in the case.

But, sir, I did not rise to discuss that question. I am opposed to the preamble to this resolution. I do not like it. In my judgment, it is not true. I admit that the rebel States have been declared to be in a state of insurrection, and the first clause of the preamble is true; the inhabitants and the local authorities of those States have been in a state of insurrection; but are the local authorities in Louisiana and Tennessee and Arkansas now in insurrection? I deny it. Who are the local authorities of Louisiana? I insist that they are those authorities that have been put in power by the proceedings under the Federal Government. I understand that Michael Hahn is the Governor of that State, and that they have a Legislature elected by the loyal people of that State; and if that be so, then it is not true that on the 8th of November last the local authorities of that State were in a state of armed rebellion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor in the chair.) The Senator from New York will suspend his remarks. The hour of two o'clock having arrived, that being the hour fixed for the consideration of a special order, in pursuance of that special order the galleries will be cleared, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 1, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting an adjusted account of the Treasurer of the United States for service in the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (S. No. 16) submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States; when the Speaker signed the same.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. CLAY, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, instructed to print fifteen thousand extra copies of the Agricultural Report for the year 1863, for the benefit and use of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. CLAY. I ask that that resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to ask what number has already been printed for the use of that Department.

Mr. CLAY. I am not positive; but ten thousand, I suppose.

No objection being made, the resolution was received, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

NIAGARA SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. SPALDING called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 126) to construct a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, which was postponed, and made the special order of the day for to-day, after the reading of the Journal, and from day to day until disposed of. To this bill the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLEJOHN] has submitted an amendment, in the nature of a substitute. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] has moved to amend the amendment by adding various sections in relation to the Illinois ship-canal. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, the war of the "great rebellion" has continued so long, and has taxed so heavily all our sympathies, as well as our national resources, that we seem to have acquired a morbid appetite for "feats of arms," and to have lost our relish for the achievements of the civic arts, forgetting that—

"Peace hath her victories
No less renowned than war."

Sir, there is no one thing that has impressed my mind with such sublime conceptions of the dignity and power of the United States, and of the ultimate ability of the Government to vanquish all its enemies, as the great fact that "the chisel of the sculptor" has not ceased to resound in the porticos of the Capitol, notwithstanding thousands upon thousands of armed foes have fought and fallen in their repeated assaults upon the majestic unity of the Republic.

On the present occasion I invoke the attention of the House while we consider a question which, while it lacks the thrilling interest that attaches to the maintenance and support of armies and navies, their successes and reverses, still is destined to have for all time a most distinguished influence upon our growth and prosperity as a people, by the grace of God, and the wisdom and valor of our sons, "FREE AND INDEPENDENT."

Mr. Speaker, on the 13th day of January of last year I had the honor, in obedience to the request of my constituents, to introduce in this House a bill to construct a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara. That bill has, by sundry continuances, been brought to the present time as the special order of the day, in connection with the substitute proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LITTLEJOHN], and the amendment to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ARNOLD.] I desire to speak mainly of the importance of making a navigable ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, reserving to myself the privilege of voting for the substitute or the amendment, one or both, as I may feel inclined at the close of this discussion.

The construction of a canal around the falls of Niagara is no new question for our consideration, or for the consideration of the country. As early as the year 1784, the very next year after the acknowledgment by Great Britain of our independence, a survey for a canal around the falls of Niagara was made under the auspices of a company organized in the State of New York for the purpose of forming a link in the chain of inland communication from the Hudson river to Lake Erie. Since then repeated surveys have been made, and repeated estimates taken, some under the patronage of the General Government, all tending to show the entire practicability, as well as the imperative necessity, of removing this natural obstruction in the way of commerce and trade between the West and the East.

The last, and I do not know but the most reliable, survey which has been made, was made by the distinguished engineer, Mr. Charles B. Stuart, of the State of New York, at the request of President Lincoln some time during the autumn of the year 1863. Mr. Stuart, in his able report, which has probably found its way to the desk of every member of this House, or if not, it should be there, and should be carefully read and maturely considered—Mr. Stuart gives the shortest route for a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara as being between the points of Schlosser and Lewiston, a distance of six miles and three thousand and seventy feet. He makes his calculations for a canal with a prism of one hundred and five feet on the surface of water, and with a depth of twelve feet; with locks two hundred and seventy-five feet in length, and forty-five feet in width, each averaging sixteen feet lift. The estimated cost of this canal with single locks is $6,007,011; with double locks, $7,680,555.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN, (in his seat.) With gold at one hundred and twenty-five per cent. premium.

Mr. SPALDING. Yes, sir, with gold at one hundred and twenty-five per cent. premium, for the estimate was made when gold was at that rate. The members of the House will perceive, in the progress of this examination, that it is proposed to have the Government extend its aid to this great enterprise in the shape of a loan of its bonds to the extent of $6,000,000. So that it is fair to inquire into the question whether the Government ought at this time to invest $6,000,000 of its credit in this great national work.

Now, sir, I claim, in the first place, that no sectional interests ought to be regarded as being particularly interested in this work; for I hold that its construction would benefit the nation at large, by swelling its resources to magnificent proportions, and by increasing its capabilities of defense against the inroads of any foreign Power. It is particularly interesting to the citizens of the great West who raise mainly the breadstuffs of the nation, and not only of the nation but of a great portion of the civilized world. And it is interesting to the great class of consumers in the East, in New England and New York. It is interesting to my constituents, and perhaps I may say with propriety, to nine or ten millions of the population of our country in its military aspect. For I say to this House, most distinctly, that while the Congress of the United States has, with a liberal hand, provided for the defenses of our cities and towns upon the sea-coast, it has contributed but sparingly, not to say grudgingly, to the defenses of the people living in the Northwest. Why, sir, it should be borne in mind that, when ten million people are asking for aid to the extent of only $6,000,000, in removing or overcoming the natural obstructions at the falls of Niagara, $150,000,000 have been appropriated for the defenses upon the Atlantic coast, saying nothing about the Navy and naval defenses. With a population of ten million people interested in the commerce of the northwestern lakes—Superior, Michigan, Huron, St. Clair, and Erie—and with two thousand ships of every description bearing the teeming productions of the West upon the bosom of those lakes continually toward an eastern market, we have now, in all the Northwest, but a single ship calculated for warlike purposes, and that ship less than one hundred tons burden, and having but one gun. We have not even lived up to the terms of the treaty of 1817, in providing for the defenses of the lakes, so far as the rights reserved to us are concerned. But, sir, during the last half century Great Britain, one of the parties of that treaty, keeping her one-gun war vessels upon the lakes, according to the stipulations of the treaty, has been continually preparing her military canals and her naval depots for any contingency that might arise wherein and whereby the United States Government might put itself into a hostile attitude toward them.

It is not necessary to call the attention of this House to the fact which was brought prominently before members during the discussion upon the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty, that Great Britain has constructed the Rideau canal from Montreal to Kingston on Lake Ontario; that she has also constructed the St. Lawrence canal around the rapids of the river St. Lawrence; that she has constructed the Welland canal, connecting, on the British side, Ontario with Lake Erie; and they now make their boast that in twenty-four hours they could throw their vessels of war from Montreal to Oswego, and in twenty-four hours more might throw their shells into the cities of Buffalo and Cleveland on Lake Erie.

Now, I ask, is it not the sublimest folly for the American people to rest in this quiescent condition when the expenditure of so little money might put them completely beyond the power of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, coupled with all the forces of the provinces?

The bill proposes to construct a canal of sufficient dimensions, with sufficient locks and sufficient depth of water, to pass gunboats from Lake Ontario into Lake Erie, or from Lake Erie into Lake Ontario. And the question at once comes back to us, cui bono? for what good would you make a canal to connect Lake Erie and Lake Ontario, unless the project be extended still further? For how will you get gunboats upon either of those lakes unless you connect with the eastern metropolis by means of an enlargement of the New York canal?

Mr. Speaker, the major part of the commercial marine upon Lakes Erie, Huron, Michigan, and Superior belongs to citizens of the United States. In this commercial marine we have fleets of steam propellers strongly built and suitable for gunboats with a little expense in giving to them an armament. Not so with Ontario. On Lake Ontario, the commercial marine belongs mainly to the Canadas; and in the event of war we have no vessels there suitable to be converted into vessels of war. We have the material on Lake Erie. We could, with very little trouble and expense, convert our freight propellers into gunboats, and those gunboats could be transported through the Niagara canal to the aid of the population residing upon Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence, if need be, without further ship-canal toward the East.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is mainly in a commercial point of view that I should like to call the attention of the House to this great subject. It is commonly thought that the young West has grown up and attained the dimensions of manhood; that it has arrived at a point beyond which it will not speedily go, and that the canals and railroads now constructed through the State of New York will take off the superabundant produce of that country with all manner of ease.

I want the members of the House who are not immediately conversant with the growth and greatness of our northwestern States to understand that they, at this time, grow five hundred million bushels of wheat and corn. I wish them to understand that one hundred million bushels are annually transmitted, already, through the canals and railroads of New York to New England and New York, in a great measure to be consumed there, but in part, and that not inconsiderable, for export to foreign countries.

I want the House to understand further, that although the northwestern States, at this time, yield this immense amount of wheat and corn, their production is increasing at the rate of twenty per cent. a year, and already the thoroughfares of transportation from the West to the East are crowded to suffocation, so that unless we have additional means of transportation afforded us from some other quarter, the necessary result must be that our people in the West must cease producing, or they must suffer their surplus produce to perish in their storehouses. We now have a ship navigation for our agricultural produce from Chicago to Buffalo, near the foot of Lake Erie. We have a further navigable ship communication toward the tide-water through the permission of Great Britain, by the way of the Welland canal, for three hundred miles more to Ogdensburg, on the St. Lawrence.

Now, I wish it remarked that the opponents of the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty threw it into our teeth more than once that our trade between the West and East through the Welland canal would be interrupted if we provoked Great Britain to unfriendly feeling. Sir, I have too much pride, as an American citizen, to be subjected to the caprice of Great Britain or any other nation. Great Britain has made her canal around the falls of Niagara, and the United States have the same opportunity to make a canal around the cataract upon her own territory, through which she could transmit her produce and merchandise, without saying to Great Britain at any time, "By your favor."

But what will be the effect of this increase in the navigable ship communication between the producing States of the West and the consuming States of the East? It is an admitted fact, I believe, that it costs just twice as much to transmit a ton of produce over a canal as it does on ship-board over the waters of the wide lakes, exclusive of tolls. It costs much less than that, in proportion to the price of freight, over the railroads. And now, although I do not profess to be well versed in matters of trade, my best information tells me that every farmer in the northwestern States who produces a bushel of wheat would be directly interested in the making of this canal around the falls of Niagara, as it would save at least five cents a bushel in getting his wheat to market. If that is the result, why should we hesitate? It is well known that many of our farmers in the West absorb most of the consideration which they obtain for their hard industry in paying the expense of getting their products to market.

It must, then, be a matter of prime necessity to attend to everything which shall reduce that expense of transportation. I say, then, and I state it as a fact ascertained by that eminent engineer of New York, Mr. Stuart—whose personal interest, if he has any, would be against this proposed improvement—there would be a saving of from three to five cents a bushel in passing the cereals of the West to an eastern market by way of the Niagara canal, instead of sending them as we now do through the canals and railroads of New York; and, taking the amount of produce which has been sent forward during the last four years as a criterion, the whole expense of making this Niagara ship-canal would be reimbursed to the people in four years by this saving. In one short term of four years the people of the Northwest, who grow this grain, would save enough to pay the whole expense of constructing this canal.

I regard that proposition as impregnable; and if so, why will the American Congress hesitate to adopt a measure of such high State necessity, and why should they hesitate to make the needed appropriation for the purpose?

And here, Mr. Speaker, I meet the only serious argument of the opposition which can be urged against this measure. I take it for granted that no man in this House will doubt the practicability of making this work, or doubt the more convenient outlet it will afford to the products of the West. But gentlemen question the policy, at this time, when the nation is engaged in a war with a portion of its own citizens, of encroaching upon the credit of the country so much as to appropriate its bonds to the extent asked for in the bill—$6,000,000. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] reminds me, I did not intend to be understood that we were asking for an appropriation of $6,000,000 in money at all. It is but an appropriation of the credit of the country in bonds, payable perhaps in twenty years, for the benefit of those who may construct this canal, it being stipulated that the whole money shall be reimbursed by taking ten per cent. of the tolls annually of the canal, and permitting all property owned by the United States—ships, materials of war, and everything of that kind—to pass toll free.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am one of the last of the members of this House who would consent in any way to embarrass the Treasury of the United States. I think I have already sufficiently evinced my opposition to the increase of salaries or anything of that kind which shall undermine the credit of our Government, so necessary to be held up at this critical period in our affairs. But, sir, I am not prepared to admit, I never was, that our national Government is not able to meet all the cost of this war of rebellion. Far from it. I insist that with our national resources we might treble the national debt, and the people of this great empire would walk off under that load without apparently feeling its weight. Why, sir, there is no country in Christendom possessed of such material means as belong to the United States, and no country is more able to bear such a burden as is devolved upon us by this grievous war. Our population in 1860 was 31,445,000 souls. The increase in every decade since 1790 has been nearly thirty-five per cent. It is estimated that in 1870 our population will be 42,318,432. We are continually receiving large additions from immigration. The official valuation of property in the country, not including slaves, was, in 1860, $14,223,618,068. As the increase of property in the last decade was one hundred and thirty per cent., it is fair to presume that the aggregate now must exceed twenty thousand million dollars. Our territorial area is 2,936,166 square miles, or 1,879,146,240 acres, of which, in May, 1863, there remained undisposed of 946,901,625 acres of arable lands, and 2,000,000 of gold and silver-bearing lands. The Government lands altogether are supposed to be worth $2,000,000,000, so that here we have a fund to fall back upon, if need be, when we attempt to exonerate ourselves from the pressure of this national debt.

In the year 1860 the cereal productions of eight States (Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan) reached 588,160,323 bushels, exceeding the whole annual produce of England, and about equal to that of France. Their cattle numbered 7,204,810; their swine, 11,039,352.

Our mineral productions are of inestimable value, and exhaustless in quantity. Our resources in the shape of coal are immense, according to the authority of Sir William Armstrong, who presented an Armstrong gun cased in mahogany to Jeff. Davis, which was captured by our gallant soldiers at Fort Fisher the other day.

And by the way, in passing, I might say that if we are at a loss to see the necessity of being prepared for any contingency that may arise of an unfriendly character as between the United States and Great Britain; and I believe the advice given to us by the Father of his country was, "If you wish to preserve peace, be prepared for war;" I say that if we are to look for the feeling that animates the English bosom, where should we go for more convincing proof than to Fort Fisher, where we find a masterpiece of artillery presented by the English inventor himself to Jeff. Davis, the prince of rebellion, to enable him to beat down the fair fabric of our Government? I say that we have warnings coming to us from every quarter to be on our guard, and it would be the part of extreme folly for the American people to pass on heedless of those manifold admonitions.

Our coal is said by Sir William Armstrong to be thirty-two times as great in quantity as that of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. And our iron bears the same proportion. The copper mines of Lake Superior and the lead and iron mines of Missouri are sources of wealth of incalculable extent. Our coast and shore line is in all 122,784 miles, and no coast on the globe has such facilities for cheap water communication. In the year 1860 our tonnage was 53,058,808 tons, and our commercial fleet on the oceans, lakes, and rivers numbered nearly 30,000 vessels. In the same year our manufactured articles amounted to $1,500,000,000; and I have but just commenced to touch upon the astonishing resources of the American people.

I say, then, that in addition to the burdens of this war, which we all hope and pray may be speedily brought to a successful, honorable, and righteous conclusion; in addition to these burdens, the American people can well afford to increase their responsibilities by loaning the credit of the United States for this great national enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, I have about concluded the few remarks which I designed to submit. I will only say that within a few days I have received a resolution adopted by the Board of Trade of the city where I live, Cleveland, Ohio, urging upon me by every sense of duty to endeavor to promote the success of this great object. The resolution is as follows:

CLEVELAND, January 17, 1865.

Resolved, By the Board of Trade of the city of Cleveland, that we, the members of this Board of Trade, are impressed more deeply than ever before with the vital importance, for the welfare and safety of the whole country, of a national ship canal around the falls of Niagara; that we earnestly invite the attention of Congress to its absolute necessity; that we cordially approve of the course of our able and patriotic Representative in relation thereto, and request him to persevere in urging the subject upon the attention of Congress and the Government.

S. F. LESTER,

President Cleveland Board of Trade.

ARTHUR H. QUINN,

Secretary.

And I have petitions without number from our people on the same subject. And if I have acquitted myself of the obligations which I owe to that honored constituency, I shall be content to leave the result to the good sense of the members of this House.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. LE BLOND. I ask unanimous consent of the House to make a statement personal to myself, which will occupy but a few moments.

No objection being made, the consent was given.

Mr. LE BLOND. Mr. Speaker, I was aware that the question in reference to making a change in the Constitution would be taken up on yesterday. I was also aware that several gentlemen had entered their names for the purpose of debating the proposition, and therefore I did not suppose that the vote would be taken upon that measure on yesterday, but supposed that it would be taken at a later period in the week.

Several gentlemen from my district having arrived here the night before, and being desirous of visiting the ninety-ninth and the one hundred and eighteenth Ohio regiments, which were raised in my congressional district, many of their members coming from my own county and town, I went with those gentlemen yesterday, supposing that the vote would not be taken at least until to-day. Had I been here I should have voted against that proposition. And I now ask that this House will permit my vote to be so recorded.

Mr. WILSON. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I have too much regard for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] not to object.

SERVICE ON COMMITTEE.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I rise to a privileged question. I ask to be excused from serving on the select committee to investigate charges against a member of this House, [Mr. ANDERSON,] on which I was appointed the other day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair forgot to bring this request to the attention of the House. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWN] made this request upon Saturday last, when, by an order of this House, no business could be considered. If no objection is made the gentleman will be excused.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, was accordingly excused from service on said select committee.

COMPENSATION FOR ENLISTED SLAVES.

Mr. CRESWELL asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to report to this House what compensation, if any, has been awarded in each of the several slave States represented in Congress to loyal persons to whom colored volunteers, at the time of their enlistment, owed service or labor; and if no compensation, or only partial compensation, has been made, that he further report the reasons or reasons why the act approved February 24, 1864, so far as it relates to compensation for such colored volunteers, has not been executed.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, objected.

NIAGARA SHIP CANAL—AGAIN.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to enter into a general discussion of the amendment which I have had the honor to offer to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLEJOHN] to this bill. For several years past the project of uniting the waters of the Mississippi and the lakes has been before Congress. That project received the sanction of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, and of other standing committees of this House. It came within two votes of passing this House in the Thirty-Seventh Congress, if I am not mistaken.

At the last session, owing to the condition of the finances of the country; owing to the fact that at this time we were unable promptly to pay our soldiers in the field; owing to the severe drain upon the Treasury, I was compelled, reluctantly and against my own judgment, by the representations of those gentlemen on this floor whom I regard as the true friends of this measure, to consent to its postponement.

Time has shown, Mr. Speaker, that if this measure had passed two years ago we should to-day have had a ship-canal through which the productions of the West might have passed from the waters of the Mississippi into the lakes. The work contemplated by the bill providing for the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan canal it was supposed could be constructed in two years, and if the bill had been passed during the Thirty-Seventh Congress there would have been to-day a ship-canal through which steamers might have gone from the cities of New Orleans and St. Louis and various points along the Mississippi to Chicago. Owing to the condition of the Treasury and the pressure for money, the friends of the Illinois and Michigan canal have consented to modify materially the character of the bill which was before Congress at the last session; and to that modification I ask for a moment the attention of the House, because I believe that if members understand the necessity of this work and the small amount which is asked by the friends of the measure, and will reflect for a moment upon the immense advantages in a military, commercial, and political point of view which are to result from its construction, I shall have the support of a majority of this House in favor of the measure now pending.

Mr. Speaker, the bill, as originally presented to the consideration of the House, provided that this work should be built exclusively by the United States. The estimated cost of that work was, in round numbers, $13,500,000. My own judgment is that that great work ought to be constructed by the Government. My own judgment is that that great thoroughfare between the Mississippi and its branches and the great inland seas of the continent, through which will pass a commerce larger in tonnage and greater in value than the entire foreign commerce of the country, ought to be made as free as the Mississippi or the St. Lawrence. But owing to the condition of the finances, we have thought it inexpedient at the present time to ask that the Federal Government shall of itself construct this work; and we only ask that the General Government shall aid the State of Illinois to the extent of only $5,000,000, and that on the condition that the State of Illinois will herself undertake to complete this work of dimensions such as will enable the Mississippi squadron, the gunboats, to pass if occasion requires from the river into the lakes; and I ask the attention of the House for a moment to the military importance of this work.

I hold in my hand the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy, stating that to-day there are upon the Mississippi and its tributaries one hundred vessels-of-war, carrying nearly five hundred guns and manned by fifty-five hundred sailors. These vessels have cost this Government nearly fifty million dollars. The Secretary of the Navy states to the American Congress that the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan canal will enable those one hundred vessels-of-war to pass from the Mississippi to the lakes. I ask the attention of intelligent gentlemen of the House to the question whether this is not the cheapest way to defend the northern frontier. You have to-day $50,000,000 of capital invested in the war steamers upon the Mississippi; and by an expenditure of $5,000,000 you will make that capital of $50,000,000 available for the defense of the northern frontier. You have there afloat five hundred guns, which can be transported from the great waters of the West into the lakes by an expenditure of $5,000,000.

The Secretary of the Navy goes on to say that many of these vessels are iron-clads; that in fresh water they will endure for many years. We know that they are unsuitable for ocean service; that if they should go into salt water they would last but a comparatively short time. In view, then, of the fact that you have those vessels-of-war already constructed; in view of the fact that they are unavailable for ocean service; in view of the fact that they will shortly become unnecessary for the Mississippi and its tributaries, I ask gentlemen of this House, what are you going to do with that $50,000,000 invested in vessels-of-war there on the Mississippi? Why, sir, it seems to me as clear as the noon-day sun that by no possible means can you invest $5,000,000 in a manner more judiciously than by expending it in the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan canal. Under the provisions of this bill there is no danger that the expenditure will not produce the result mentioned. It provides for a contract between the State of Illinois and the Federal Government by which the State of Illinois undertakes, on her part, that she will herself enlarge the canal to a size and capacity adequate to float these vessels into the lakes upon the condition that she shall receive this sum of $5,000,000 to aid her in that work; and that sum not all to be advanced at once. Five hundred thousand dollars are to be expended by the State for every $500,000 advanced by the Federal Government, and so on in installments of $500,000 for every $500,000 expended by the State, until the $5,000,000 is expended.

I am aware that the construction of the Niagara ship-canal is pressed upon the consideration of this House as a military measure, and, in my judgment, there is great merit in it both as a military and commercial measure. But it will not escape the intelligent attention of the members of the House that such a canal will connect only two lakes—Lake Ontario and Lake Erie; while the Illinois and Michigan canal will connect twenty thousand miles of the navigable waters of the Mississippi and its tributaries with all the great inland seas which lie in the center of our continent. And it will also not escape the attention of members of the House that when the Niagara ship-canal shall have been constructed there is no way of taking vessels-of-war into Lake Ontario unless you construct a canal from Lake Ontario to the Hudson river. It is not to be supposed that a vessel-of-war will be permitted to come from the Gulf of St. Lawrence and pass up the St. Lawrence under the guns of the forts of Quebec and through the Lachine canals into Lake Ontario. The Illinois and Michigan canal will furnish a means by which these naval vessels already in existence may be transported into all the lakes, and used, if occasion shall require, along the whole line of northern frontier.

Sir, there are two ways of defending that northern frontier: one by the construction of these canals, and the introduction into the lakes of these naval vessels; or, otherwise, the construction of shore defenses. Committees of Congress are already considering the propriety of appropriating $10,000,000 for constructing land fortifications upon the frontier. A resolution has been adopted requiring a committee of the Senate to inquire and report whether it is expedient for the Government to appropriate $10,000,000 for the purpose of commencing and carrying forward the shore defenses of the frontier. When you remember that the frontier is three thousand miles long; when you remember the lakes and rivers along which it passes; when you see that that line of frontier is greater than the whole Atlantic coast; when you remember that $150,000,000 have been expended upon the defenses of the Atlantic shore in the construction of forts and fortifications, and the work still in progress, I ask gentlemen how far an appropriation of $10,000,000 will go in the erection of shore defenses for the protection of the northern frontier.

It appears to me perfectly clear that the true and most economical way of defending the northern frontier is to open these ship-canals, by which the naval forces of the country can be taken from the Mississippi into the lakes. It will not only give us the Mississippi squadron, but we have, among the six hundred vessels afloat in the salt water, upon the Atlantic coast, many vessels built to run along the coast, to enter the bays and inlets, which in case of need could be taken up the Mississippi and through the canal into the lakes.

This canal is already advanced far toward completion as a ship-canal. The Federal Government at an early day aided in its construction by a grant of land. Those lands have been sold and the proceeds appropriated toward the construction of that work. In addition to that, the State of Illinois herself has expended between five and six million dollars on the work, and the excavation has been for much of the distance carried to the requisite depth and width to make it a ship-canal. It is now only necessary that the work shall be completed which has already advanced far toward completion. It only requires now the carrying out of the original design, which was that of a ship-canal from the lakes to the Mississippi.

Looking at the matter in the light of economy, the Government of the United States will obtain, for an expenditure of $5,000,000, a canal which will have cost when it is completed more than twenty-five million dollars. This great work, so necessary as a military work, so economical as a means of defense to the northern frontier, costing $25,000,000, will be secured to the nation at an expenditure of $5,000,000.

These, Mr. Speaker, are briefly some of the reasons why I present this measure for the consideration of the House, and ask for it a favorable consideration, as a military measure simply, as a measure necessary for the defense of the country; and, in that aspect, I trust, it will address itself to the minds of members on that side of the House who are not willing to embark in any general scheme of internal improvement. In the first place, our northern frontier must be defended. We have arrived at that period in our history when ten million people living along the shores of the lakes and on the frontier must be heard. They have a right to be heard and protected. You have expended $150,000,000 on the Atlantic coast; you have erected fortifications along the sea-board to that amount; you have expended your hundreds of millions in the construction of a vast Navy, a Navy superior to that of any nation on the earth. I ask gentlemen now to turn their attention to the northern frontier. You will see that the whole line of coast from the Gulf of St. Lawrence to Lake Superior is utterly and completely defenseless. There is nothing there in the way of defense. I know that an American Congress will no longer permit this condition of things to exist. Congress must either commence the construction of a fleet for the lakes, and to that end make an appropriation of at least $10,000,000, or it must (and this I think would be far wiser and better) open this canal through which your vessels can be taken into the lakes.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I will send to the desk, and ask to have read, an extract from the report of the Committee on Military Affairs made to the House, showing the reasons why that committee recommended the construction of this work.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The first advantage of these canals to the United States would be, then, the avoidance of those otherwise unavoidable evils. A second advantage would be found in our ability to make one fleet answer for two. A third advantage would be that we could build on the Ohio, Mississippi, Missouri, Illinois, Hudson, and along the lines of the canals, free from all danger of attacks, and where labor and materials would be abundant and cheap. A fourth advantage would be equally decided: instead of being useless to the United States except on the lakes where built, the digging of canals would enable our vessels on the lakes, in ten days after the receipt of orders, to make their appearance at New Orleans or Mobile for naval movements in the West Indies, or at New York, to operate in the North Atlantic, two thousand miles further to the northeast. The possession of a power to transfer a blockaded fleet by a safer inland route from New York to New Orleans or from New Orleans to New York, is of itself an incalculable advantage in times of war with a strong maritime power. A fifth advantage might arise in this wise: should the British fleet winter at the naval depot, under the protection of the fortress, as its safety and convenience would dictate, our fleet, long after the British fleet was ice-bound, could pass down the Mississippi, and aid our forces in the Gulf of Mexico and Caribbean sea a third of the year, and yet be back to its station before the enemy could sail from its ice-bound harbor.

"The last advantage which your committee will name at this time is the facilities the canals would afford in times of peace to agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and the mechanic arts. Practically the navigable channel of the Hudson is extended to the Mississippi. The steamship loaded at St. Paul, Omaha, St. Louis, Louisville, Memphis, or Chicago, would transport its thousand, fifteen hundred, or two thousand tons of produce to New York, Boston, or Philadelphia, or any other port on the entire coast, at the pleasure of its owners, and exchange it for every fabric known to the merchant and artisan. This would infuse new vigor into all industrial pursuits, and benefit all portions of this great country. It is believed that if eighty-two horse boats can afford to pay tolls high enough to support shallow canals, two thousand-ton steamboats, being subjected to less expense per ton, can afford to pay enough higher to support deeper canals of greater cost, especially considered in connection with the far larger amount of business the deep canal could transact. They ought within a reasonable time to reimburse their first cost. Hence no reason is perceived from the money point of view why these exceedingly important military channels should not be dug."

Mr. ARNOLD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether, in the present condition of the country, it is not the duty of every statesman to provide for the defense of the northern frontier, and whether the time for doing so has not arrived. If it be so, I ask whether, when we have this fleet in the Mississippi, when the State of Illinois offers to construct this work with the aid of $5,000,000, and to give the General Government the use of it for the purposes of defense forever, we ought not to give to this measure our support, and whether it ought not to become at once a law.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to discuss at length the commercial importance of this canal. I will only say that it will connect more than twenty thousand miles of the navigable waters of the Mississippi and its tributaries with the great inland seas of North America. There is not a loaf of bread, nor a bushel of corn, nor a barrel of pork or of beef, consumed in New England or New York, that will not be cheapened by the opening of this canal. There is not a manufactured article of the East the price of which will not be lessened to the consumers in the valley of the Mississippi by the opening of this canal. There is not an acre of land lying between the western shore of Lake Michigan and the Rocky mountains that will not be very largely enhanced in value by this canal. And all these benefits can be realized, independently of its military advantages, for an expenditure of some $5,000,000. Your generals in the field suggest to the Secretary of War a military expedition, and it is considered a very small affair if it costs no more than that sum. Here, then, is a proposition to secure military advantages so important to the defense of the country, and which will not be temporary in their character, but as permanent as the existence of the Republic, for which you are called upon for an expenditure of only $5,000,000.

I desire to call the attention of members of the House from the sea-board to a fact which they sometimes overlook, it seems to me; and that is, that the nations against which they fortify their coasts are at a distance of three thousand miles across the ocean from them. Three thousand miles of ocean lie between them and any possible foe. And yet they tell us that, from the coast of Maine to Florida, they must have these expensive coast defenses. Not only that, but they ask us, year after year, to expend money by fifties and hundreds of millions in the construction and maintenance of a Navy to defend them against an enemy three thousand miles off. The northern frontier is within rifle and cannon-shot distance of a foreign nation; and yet, all along that frontier the people, absorbed in their material progress and advancement, have not, up to the present time, asked or received the consideration of Congress in the way of preparing for its defense. And now, when George Saunders and his rebel associates in Canada have succeeded in disturbing, to some extent, the relations between the British provinces and the United States, when rebel emissaries have gone into Canada and organized these raids against frontier towns, it is time that these questions should receive the grave and careful consideration of Congress. This House changed, the other day, its previous action in regard to the reciprocity treaty. At the last session of Congress this House voted against giving the notice to terminate that treaty. This session it voted to give the notice. This change in the judgment of the House is, no doubt, attributable to the action of rebel emissaries in Canada. Whatever may be the differences of opinion in reference to the expediency of terminating that treaty, all admit that in view of the preparations on the other side of the frontier the period has arrived when it becomes us also to be prepared for all contingencies. Not that I believe we shall have difficulties with Great Britain, but the way to preserve peace is to be prepared for war.

My friend from the Cleveland district of Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] has presented statistics showing the growth of the West. His argument was addressed mainly to the construction of the Niagara ship-canal. I regard the canal from the Mississippi to the lakes and the Niagara ship-canal as parts of one great system. But it will be obvious to every gentleman from the valley of the Mississippi that the Niagara ship-canal is comparatively valueless to all that region unless a ship-canal be also opened from the Mississippi to the lakes. To Minnesota, to Iowa, to western Wisconsin and western Illinois, to Missouri, and to those new States that are rising up westward, the Niagara ship-canal cannot be of any possible use without a connection between the great father of waters and the lakes. I hope that no action will be taken by the friends of the Niagara ship-canal which may be regarded as antagonistic to the great measure of enlarging the Illinois and Michigan canal. I believe, as I said, that both works are part of one great system. I believe that they ought both to be constructed. I believe that, as a military measure and as a commercial measure, they ought to be constructed. But if the condition of our finances is such that we can begin only one of them now, then I submit that by the construction of the Niagara ship-canal none of our war vessels can be taken into the lakes, as they can be by the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan canal. By this latter work hundreds of our vessels-of-war can be transferred from the Mississippi and its tributaries to the lakes. It is a work of immediate military necessity. I trust, therefore, that the friends of the Niagara ship-canal will take no step nor indicate any action that will place them in antagonism to the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan canal.

In regard, Mr. Speaker, to the importance of this canal, so far as regards the commercial aspects of the question, I appeal to the State of New York, I appeal to New England, and I ask the Representatives of that section, whether they are not willing that the Treasury shall pay to the extent of $5,000,000 to enable the products of the great West to be poured in upon New York and New England. I ask the Representatives of New England whether, when they can cheapen the price of every loaf of bread consumed in their manufacturing, they will refrain from voting this sum of $5,000,000, for the benefit of their own section and of all sections of the country. I ask the votes of members from the Northwest; from Iowa, and Missouri, and Minnesota. These two great sections will be bound together forever by this canal. I ask members to give us these great commercial advantages, and thus bind the East and West together forever.

I will ask the Clerk to read an extract from a letter of Edward Everett on the subject of this canal, showing how that distinguished statesman regarded it.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"I know of no public work, within the limits of the United States at all comparable in importance with a communication like that proposed between the Atlantic and the Mississippi. The resources of the West are boundless and still in the infancy of their development; nature has formed the two great sections of the country, East and West, for the most intimate and mutually beneficial relations with each other. Much has already been done to open those pathways, to which the hand of the Almighty Engineer has pointed the way, and nothing is wanted to complete the work but an appropriation of the resources of the country, which, with reference to the importance of the objects to be promoted, ought not, however considerable in itself, to occasion a moment's hesitation."

Mr. ARNOLD. As the Speaker of this House is engaged in the duties of the Chair, and as I have in my hand an argument from him in favor of this work, I will ask the Clerk to read it, so that the Speaker may not find it necessary to leave his position in the chair and repeat his argument here on the floor of the House.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The great enlarged canals, creating another Mississippi from West to East, will strengthen the bond between the sea-board and the frontier, and give to that fervid patriotism which declares that the whole Union must remain intact forever the potential aids of commercial policy and industrial interest."

"The nation also will reap a rich pecuniary reward from the completion of this great enterprise; but I can glance hurriedly at but one of two points. When the shipment of produce, by the sale of which the farmer lives, from the frontier to the ocean costs one third to one half, and even three fourths, of the whole amount realized for it when it reaches the wharf, the producers must necessarily be poor customers for all these goods by the duties on which our Treasury is in a large degree replenished; but with the cost of transit reduced, as it will be by the broad artificial river to the sea which you contemplate, the prosperity among our agriculturists which will follow will be felt in that result on the Treasury receipts which can be predicted with such unerring certainty again."

"When the United States tax assessor computes the invoice of the farmer, and values the corn at ten or twenty cents per bushel, he can find but few that will be required to aid the Treasury tax on their surplus profits."

"But with the West, by decreased cost of transportation, brought in prices so much nearer the East, the increased taxes on the increased wealth resulting from your improvement will indicate its wisdom even as a pecuniary investment."

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, a moment's reflection on the results to be realized by the expenditure of this money, the military, commercial, and political results, will remove every objection which could remain in the mind of any member to this proposition.

Why, sir, when this work shall have been enlarged you will have from the city of St. Louis to the city of Chicago a river greater in capacity for commercial purposes than the Mississippi from St. Louis to New Orleans. When it is remembered what an amount of treasure and of life has been sacrificed—no, not sacrificed, but expended, necessarily expended, in reopening the Mississippi—and when it is seen that a great river for commerce, equal in importance, can be obtained by the expenditure of this small sum of money, I trust that no gentleman will hesitate to give this measure his support.

It may be said that the present railways are adequate to carry off the surplus products of the Northwest. This is entirely a mistake. The Northwest pays to the New York railways and canals and to the Pennsylvania railways more than $30,000,000 per annum for the transportation of her products to the sea-board; but all of those railways and canals are entirely inadequate to carry off the surplus products of the West.

Now we of the West know, and this House knows, that it is no unusual thing for the corn grown there to be used for fuel because of the expense of transporting that corn to the sea-board. We know that for months in the year the present means of transportation are utterly inadequate to carry forward our teeming products to market.

Upon this subject I will ask the Clerk to read a statement made by an intelligent gentleman of my State, showing the need of this work as a means of transportation.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Nine tenths of the products of Illinois grown near the lines of railways constructed within the last fifteen years, and upon which over three fourths of the population of the State reside, have hitherto been forwarded to eastern markets. If the southern trade was resumed at once it would, doubtless, be found at the close of navigation next year that as large a supply of food will be left in the country solely from the want of means during the periods of navigation of the lakes and canal to take forward the surplus."

"This food-producing district should have closer connection with the commercial interests of the East and of Europe by a national canal. Every fiber of the national wealth and prosperity will be strengthened thereby. The harvests from our prairies will double our foreign exports when this grain is poured out as rapidly as it can be furnished even by our present population."

"Within five years after the construction of a ship-canal from the Erie to the Hudson, a necessary outlet from the lakes to the sea, the exports of grain from Chicago alone may safely be estimated at two hundred million bushels."

"For two or three years past we have had a surplus equal to ten times our canal or railroads to take away. The cost and delays of transportation are so great that the farmers reap no fitting reward for their industry. Their crops are wasted, and, living in this abundance, which is wanted everywhere else, they are poor, and need the comforts and luxuries of life. Single-handed they cannot remedy this evil. For aid they must look to the national resources. The work is of national importance, and must add immensely to the national wealth."

Mr. ARNOLD. I do not propose to continue this discussion. I merely desire to call the attention of the House to a few additional facts indicating the rapid growth of the West, then I will yield the floor to others.

The following statement was prepared by a member of the Board of Trade of Chicago, and I believe is correct:

	$147,456,449

The gentleman who has furnished the above figures; and who is an intelligent member of the Board of Trade, states that, taking the months of February and March to be the same as last year, the year ending April, 1865, will be as follows:

Flour and grain.....	75,000,000
Cattle in beefs.....	400,000
Packed in Chicago.....	80,000
Hogs.....	1,600,000
Packed in Chicago.....	720,000

It is now demonstrated that Chicago is the largest grain, beef, pork, and lumber market in the world.

Illinois has paid to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as taken from his returns, the twelve months ending June 30, 1864.....$11,814,154

Six of her sister States have paid as follows:
Indiana.....	$4,246,110
Michigan.....	1,642,672
Wisconsin.....	1,384,893
Iowa.....	879,519
Minnesota.....	143,412
Kansas.....	103,782

8,400,088

$3,414,066

Illinois has given to the Government the past year nearly twelve million dollars, and $3,414,066 more than six of her sister States in the West.

The beautiful quarries of what is called the Athens marble are situated on the line of and are quarried out of the bed of the canal, and lie along its banks within thirty miles of Chicago.

The valley of the Illinois alone, when all put under cultivation, can easily produce more corn than is now raised in the whole State. The crop of corn of 1864 will not fall far short of two hundred million bushels.

Now, when military advantages so important as those which have been stated, and when commercial results so vast, can be obtained by an expenditure of less than half of the amount which Illinois alone contributes to the public Treasury in one year, I trust this House will not hesitate to vote for the amendment which I have offered. That amendment, I think, contains every possible safeguard that the nation will secure the advantages of the ship-canal by this expenditure; or if any gentleman is not satisfied of that fact, I shall be glad to so modify my amendment as to provide sufficient security that this expenditure of $5,000,000 will be so used as will secure the construction of the canal of the dimensions and capacity proposed.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I propose to occupy the attention of the House for a few minutes while I present a few considerations which will induce me to support this amendment. The importance of the work proposed in the original bill is one which has impressed itself upon the country for years. So far back as 1836 an engineer was appointed by the Government to make surveys and estimates for this work. But for divers reasons the Congress of the United States passed over what I conceive to be, and to have been at all times, a work of national importance in a military as well as in a commercial point of view. From 1836 to the present time its importance has been magnified every year. In a commercial point of view its importance has been increasing with fearful rapidity, until to-day it presses home upon every member of this House who has a constituency that either produces or consumes the products of the great Northwest.

I shall not detain the House by speaking of the rapid development of that portion of our country. The statistics and the history of the country are full of facts which ought to have great weight in determining this question. We are improving what a few years ago was a wilderness. We are not only supplying our own wants; we are not only raising a surplus of provisions to supply the wants of the manufacturing and non-producing States of this Union, but we are raising a surplus to feed the starving millions of the world, if we only had lines of transportation opened by means of which we might reach those markets. What we need, and what we must and will have, in one way or another, is certain as well as reasonable transportation for our products. I repeat, what the Northwest needs, and what the Northwest must and will have, is a certain as well as reasonable means of transporting her products to the markets of the world.

The House has already been shown by statistics that every year there are left over millions of bushels of our grain that fails to reach markets for want of transportation, and those who have taken the trouble to look into the charges and tariffs and inflictions and exorbitant exactions that are made upon the producers of the West by what few lines of transportation exist by means of which we are to reach the Atlantic coast, cannot fail to be impressed with the importance of a reformation in this regard, by opening up another channel that will not only give us a certainty of reaching the markets, but give us the power of reaching them at reasonable charges.

I have taken some pains to look into the tariff of charges imposed by the various transportation companies from the East to the West, and it does seem to me that if members of this House would devote a half hour of their valuable time to investigating this question they could not fail to feel the force of the reasons that I propose to urge for opening up another great thoroughfare between the East and the West. From the city of Chicago to the city of New York we are charged the enormous tax of thirty-six dollars upon every ton of freight that passes over the present lines. Upon every bushel of wheat that passes over those lines, according to their present rates, we have to pay a tax of ninety-eight cents to get it to an eastern market. Upon every bushel of corn, one of the great staples of the Northwest, the charges amount to $1 20; upon every bushel of rye the charges are $1 00; upon every bushel of oats $1 15; upon every barrel of flour $3 65; and upon every barrel of pork $4 40. When you add to these charges the commissions which we have to pay, it is wonderful that they do not amount to an entire blockade; and it would, were it not the fact that the men who deal in those articles in the East are compelled to purchase for their own support.

Until a recent period we in the Northwest, in the absence of ordinary fuel, have burned our corn in our grates and our stoves, finding that cheaper fuel than the products of the mine and the spoils of the forest. The cost of transporting those products was so great that we found it cheaper to burn the product of our fields. What we want are facilities for reaching the markets of the world; some line of communication that will enable us to reach the Atlantic coast with the products of the West, without paying those enormous exactions of the railroad and canal companies. I am aware that I will be met with the answer from some gentlemen here that it is the true policy of the Government to allow States and individuals to control these matters. But that is an objection which does not apply to the measure under consideration, for the reason that there is no hope of any one of the States of this Union building this great line of communication between the lakes and the St. Lawrence, because the State of New York, which has done much in that respect, will not make the exertion. She will very certainly not build a canal which will carry our products away from her great metropolis in their transit to the Atlantic. She prefers to hold us at her mercy, and compel us to transport our products over her railroads and through her canals. Hence I repeat that we can have no reasonable hope or expectation that the State of New York will engage in this work, though I know that the liberality of her citizens—at any rate, of a portion of her Representatives—will aid us in enabling the General Government to accomplish this great work.

Mr. Speaker, within the last two or three years we have not only been taxed enormously to get our surplus products to market, but we have had no certainty as to the time of getting them to market. What gives value to produce, what gives remuneration to those who till the soil, who produce the breadstuffs, is a certainty, not only as to the price to be received, but as to the time of reaching market. We have not had this. Those who have traveled over the lines of communication between the Northwest and the city of New York, and whose attention has been called to the subject, have observed at the important depots and way stations along the line immense quantities of produce thrown out of the cars on its transit from the West to the East to await the convenience of the railroad companies to carry it on to its destination in the city of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, these delays, this uncertainty as to the time at which our products will reach the market, depreciate them in value, and injure to a large extent the great commercial and agricultural interests of the Northwest, the producing section of this country. Why is it that Europe will not purchase her breadstuffs from this country? Why is it that she looks to the Baltic for her wheat or her flour? It is not because she can purchase more cheaply there than we can furnish her; it is simply because the merchant of Liverpool or London knows that when he makes his purchase at the Baltic he can calculate with a reasonable degree of certainty as to the time at which the produce purchased will reach Liverpool. Do you say that he could calculate with the same degree of certainty if he would purchase produce in New York? I admit that he could; but when he engages with a New York merchant to furnish him a cargo of flour, that New York merchant must look to the West for the cargo, and he is unable to inform his British correspondent as to the time at which the cargo will be ready to leave the port of New York, owing to the difficulties of transportation between the West and the East. The British merchant could buy his produce in New York as cheaply as he could buy it at the Baltic, if it were there, or if he had a reasonable certainty that it would be there upon a particular day.

I repeat, that it is only by the want of reasonable certainty in the transportation from the West to the East that we lose a valuable market in Europe for our breadstuffs. Why, sir, it is a fact that flour can be shipped more cheaply from San Francisco to Europe by water than it can be from the city of Chicago. Why? Simply because our lines of communication are not sufficient to meet the wants of commerce.

But it may be said that it would be a wasteful expenditure of money to engage in this work now; that Canada is opening up lines of communication, which, in addition to those on our own soil, we can use in reaching the European markets. Mr. Speaker, how long those Canadian lines of communication will be open to us none of us know. The Congress of the United States, in the exercise of their judgment, have seen fit to terminate the commercial treaty between the United States and Great Britain; and how long we shall be permitted to use the Canadian roads or canals on reasonable terms no man can tell. It is not to be supposed that, with our former relations disturbed, the Canadians will be any more lenient to us in affording us facilities for transportation than will be the transporting companies upon our own soil. What, then, do we need? What, then, must we have? I repeat, a sufficient as well as a certain outlet for the products of the West to the markets of the world.

It is sometimes argued against the expenditure of money for the purpose of this canal, that so soon as this war closes the Mississippi will be again opened to the agricultural products of the Northwest; and that the rates of transportation will be cheapened between the East and the West as soon as that is done. I admit that there is some force in that argument. The probability is that if the navigation of the Mississippi was opened to us we would be able to reach some of the markets of the world with some portion of our products at a cheaper rate than we now do. But in my judgment the surplus products of the Northwest are too great ever to find a remunerative market through the channel of the Mississippi; that we are compelled to look for a market to the East and to Europe; that our lines of transportation must be from the West to the East either through the St. Lawrence to tide-water, or else through the canals and over the railroads of the State of New York.

It is true that when we had but a few surplus bushels of grain in the great Northwest, and the Mississippi was unobstructed, we could find a market along the coast and at New Orleans for that small surplus. But the products of the great Northwest have so rapidly increased that, were we at peace to-day and the Mississippi river open, that river would not afford a tithe of the markets necessary to consume our surplus.

It may be argued that in times like these the Government ought not to involve itself in the expenditure of the money necessary for the completion of this work. Why, sir, it is for the interest of the Government to make liberal expenditures, if by making such expenditures it places a great section of the country in a condition to enable her to aid in carrying through this war and meet the Government engagements. It has already been shown by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] that the opening of this line of communication would be worth to every farmer in the West, who raises a bushel of grain for sale, the sum of five cents per bushel—enough in the course of a very short period to indemnify the country for the expense of the construction of this work.

Now, sir, I have not within my reach statistical information sufficient to approximate anything like an accurate statement of the amount of the immense surplus of the Northwest; but I have a statement of the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago, embracing the period from 1860 to 1864, showing the amount of shipments of western grain from that port alone. It will be found upon examination that for those four years Chicago alone shipped of western grain, including flour, 2,904,125 bushels. If that one port ships that quantity, what must have been the amount sent out from other cities along the lake shore, as well as those towns and cities in the interior which have been furnishing through other routes of transportation their surplus grain?

In addition to this, in the year 1864 the city of Chicago received and shipped from her port 701,854 head of hogs, and 179,525 head of bees. This does not include nearly 1,000,000 hogs and bees which were slaughtered and packed in the city of Chicago, and which must ultimately find a market on the sea-board over our present limited lines of transportation from the West to the East.

In view of these considerations, I ask if Congress can more wisely invest or loan its credit to the extent of ten or fifteen million dollars, than in opening a line of ship communications with the lakes of the Northwest and the Atlantic coast, for the purpose of opening up to these immense granaries of the West a line of communication cheap and certain, by which their surplus products may reach the markets of the world?

What I have said with reference to the importance of this work as a line of cheap and certain communication of the products which go from the West to the East applies with equal force to that which we have to receive in return for our substance. And on this point I can speak with more confidence, for I have in some small degree been made to feel for the last three or four years the necessity of a certain as well as a cheap communication between the West and the East. Sir, our western people look to New York and New England for the fabrics and merchandise which they need; and they and the business men of the West are made to feel with great force and power the necessity of some more certain as well as cheap communication between the East and the West.

Sir, a western merchant, when he makes his purchases in New York, cannot calculate with any degree of certainty upon receiving at the West a cargo of goods purchased in New York in less than thirty days. Well, time in these business transactions is money, and the customers of the merchant have to pay for the loss of time. It is no uncommon thing for a bale of merchandise, between New York and Illinois, to be detained on the way for sixty or ninety days, and when we inquire the reason we are told by the transportation companies that they are so crowded that it is impossible for them to get the goods through in less time.

Some two or three years ago the merchants of the West induced men who were able to do so to organize a merchants' express, with a view to the speedier and more certain transportation of merchandise from the East to the West than is possible over the ordinary lines of transportation. But that merchants' express has found in its way the same difficulties that lie in the way of the canals and railways between the two sections of the country; and to-day we have no more certainty that we can receive a bale of goods in Illinois from New York in less than sixty or ninety days than we had over the ordinary lines of transportation.

I repeat, that just as you open more facilities for reaching the markets of the world, just as you increase the number of lines of transportation, you cheapen the cost of the transportation of our grain from the West to the East, and of the merchandise that we of the West need from the East to the West.

In making these remarks, I have left out of view entirely the military aspects of this question. I leave them to those who are better able to discuss them, and who have devoted more time to the subject than I have been able to do. In a commercial point of view alone it is a subject which commends itself to the consideration of the House with great force, and in my view, with such force that no man who desires the prosperity of both the East and West can fail to give his support to it, offering to us, as it does, the only certain and speedy line of communication between the agricultural regions of the great Northwest and the Atlantic ocean.

I have already occupied more of the time of the House than I designed doing when I rose, and I will now yield the floor to others who may see fit to participate in this discussion.

Mr. STROUSE. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee which reported this bill, I was at first disposed to oppose it, but I have changed my views upon the subject, and am entirely convinced that it will be a public improvement of the greatest benefit and advantage to our country, to the commercial and agricultural interests of the East and of the West.

As a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, I was at first inclined to oppose this measure, believing that it might, to some extent, interfere with the public improvements already in existence. Upon an examination, however, of its route, its location, and the connecting links, I find that not only are the States of the West and New York and New England to be benefited and advantaged by it, but also the great Keystone State. By means of our network of railways and canals we shall be brought into communication with this work, and the products of the West can be brought to tide-water, not only at the city of New York but also to the port of Philadelphia, by means of our great network of railways and canals which will place us directly in communication with this great national work.

I look upon this matter, Mr. Speaker, from a double stand-point: first, as a question of commerce and business, and second, as a military work, in case of necessity. In both those aspects, I think, the measure must commend itself to every one who will examine the question, and who will ascertain the necessity of having a ship outlet at that point.

I make these remarks, Mr. Speaker, because I believe that every Representative here is interested in the extension of our public works of internal improvement. We ought to foster and sustain every improvement of this kind. The amount asked for in this bill is small. I believe it is only $6,000,000. The Government is not even asked for a direct appropriation of this amount, but for a loan of its credit, with the most perfect indemnity for its certain repayment. And even if it were never to be repaid, I believe that the public treasure of the United States belongs to the people at large, and that we, as their Representatives, have a right to say that so much money shall be expended, or so much credit given, for the benefit of the whole country. I trust that members will take a national view of this matter, and divest themselves of all narrow ideas and of all local prejudices, and that they will vote for a bill which will be, undoubtedly, of the greatest advantage to every part of our Union.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, the proposition before the House appears to be to make a canal around the falls of Niagara, and also to widen certain existing canals in the State of Illinois. The arguments advanced this morning that the House should vote an appropriation of the credit of the United States in aid of those enterprises appear to be addressed to us altogether on commercial grounds. The several gentlemen who have advocated this bill (and no one has yet spoken against it) place their arguments, as I understand, altogether on the necessity of improving those means of inter-communication so as to cheapen the transit of merchandise and to facilitate commerce. Now, if I supposed that that was the object, and the exclusive object, of these measures, I could not give them my vote. I know, sir, that the time has passed when the Congress of the United States troubled itself about the powers of Government. I know that a legislator is looked upon almost as an antiquarian, who doubts the power of Congress on the subject of internal improvements, because, in these times, we not only have latitudinarian constructions of the Constitution, but we have open and palpable disregard of its plain provisions and principles.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if, as gentlemen have stated, the object of this bill were simply to facilitate commerce, to cheapen the transit of merchandise, to open communication from one section of the country to another, for the advantage of either or both, I, with my ideas of the restriction which the Constitution places on the powers of Congress, would be obliged to give my vote in the negative. But, in my opinion, there are other reasons why we should vote, not only for the Niagara ship-canal, but why we should also vote in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ARNOLD,] to make a like appropriation for the enlargement of the canals of that State. There can be no question but that the foreign relations of this country are in a condition where we are warranted in doing all that we can to protect ourselves. There can be no doubt of the fact that the foreign relations of the Government of the United States, with one or two, if not more, of the nations of Europe, are certainly threatening, to use no stronger language. They warrant the Government of the United States in doing everything that it can to put itself in a position of defense so that it can maintain the honor of the country and protect its interests.

It has been stated this morning that, as we now stand, if there were any international difficulty on the borders of our country there are no means in our power to send a fleet of war vessels from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario. We have already given the notice to England to terminate the reciprocity treaty. Therefore, in case of hostilities with England or with Canada, we would be cut off from any advantage by the Welland canal, and from any advantage on the Canadian side of the lakes. In my judgment it is important, ay, sir, it is indispensable, that we should have the physical means to take our vessels from one lake to another. We might, for instance, as the matter now stands, have a large fleet of gunboats upon Lake Erie, but we could have no means of transporting those boats from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario; and however large our marine armament might be upon one of those lakes, it would be of no service upon the other lake or to our coasts on the borders of those lakes. It therefore does seem to me, from this consideration alone, that the House should pass not only the appropriation in reference to the Niagara ship-canal, but also the one for the improvement of the Illinois ship-canal.

Mr. Speaker, before the final vote is taken upon this bill I would suggest to the honorable gentleman, my colleague [Mr. LITTLEJOHN] who has charge of this bill, the propriety of so modifying or amending it in the appointment of engineers, without naming them, as to give one to the Government, one to the corporation proposed to be created, and one to the State of New York. I suggest to him that that amendment would better secure the object he has in view, and would probably facilitate the progress of the work.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, section one, article eight, of the Constitution provides that Congress shall have the power to provide for the general welfare of the United States. From that article alone, independent of any military exigencies, or military powers of the Government or of Congress, I deem that Congress has full power to make this appropriation; not only for the building of the ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, but for enlarging the Illinois canal so that gunboats or other Government transports can be transferred from the Mississippi river to Lake Michigan, and from thence by the lakes and through the proposed canal around the falls of Niagara into Lake Ontario; and that, under the same provision of the Constitution, Congress has the further power to improve the rapids of the Mississippi river in which my friends from Iowa are so much interested.

I am in favor of no niggardly, picayune policy. I am against squandering the public money; but I am in favor of developing this great country, whether that country is embraced within the limits of the State of New York or the limits of the State of Illinois, or the limits of the State of Iowa, or anywhere within the limits of what is known as the great Northwest. I hope I have as few local prejudices as any one. I am in favor of the development of the whole country, and I am in favor of the strong arm of the Government lending itself to the heroism and the patriotism and the energy of the people to develop the whole country and provide for the general welfare of the people thereof.

No man in his senses can doubt that this is a proposition looking to the improvement of the condition of the country; and this proposition to construct a canal around the falls of Niagara, and to enlarge the Illinois ship-canal, is calculated materially to improve the whole country, and especially New England, New York, and Pennsylvania, as well as Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Iowa, and the other States composing the grand Northwest. And how will it improve the condition of the people of New England? I insist that the people of New England are as deeply interested as the people of Illinois and the entire Northwest in the enlargement of this Illinois canal. They are not exclusively but essentially a manufacturing people. They have grown rich; I do not envy them their riches. They occupy a grand and glorious position in this country, and I rejoice in that position. Let them go on with their manufacturing; let them supply the country with cloths; let them supply our Army and the people with shoes; let them supply us with guns and with ordnance of every kind. Let them go on and make their needles and pins, their sewing machines and steam engines. Let them go on in this prosperous career of industry; and let us of the North-west be the great producers, and furnish them with corn, wheat, flour, and pork. Let us give them these products of the soil; and, at the same time they are gaining wealth by their manufactures, let us also be permitted to reap the benefits of our own industry and our own energy in furnishing them food at a cheap, or, at least, a reasonable cost of transportation.

It has been said, but I will not refer particularly to the statistics, that the great Northwest produces to-day tenfold the amount of surplus products that can find an outlet to the sea-board by the present means of transportation. Yet we are to-day but in our infancy. Illinois alone can produce corn and wheat enough to feed the entire population of the United States, and then have a surplus for Great Britain.

We have, sir, an area of fifty-seven thousand square miles, and almost every square mile is susceptible of cultivation. But, sir, it is useless for us to go on and fill our granaries with uncounted millions, unless we can find an outlet for that grain. We can find this outlet; we can supply the great demand that will come to us from Europe and from New England, if we can but have this channel of commerce opened, that we may send our surplus products to those who need them and demand them. But now we are absolutely robbed by these systems of railroads running from the West to the East. They place upon our products their own tariff, compelling us to pay whatever amount of freight they may determine, and we are powerless to resist it. There is so much more to be transported than they all can possibly transport that there is no competition between the lines of communication from Chicago, from St. Louis, from Cincinnati, or any of the other great depots of the West, and the Atlantic sea-board. They can put on their own tariff, and we must submit.

Sir, it is time that this condition of things should be changed. It is time that the manufacturing interest of New York and New England, it is time that the people, should demand that Congress shall make an appropriation which, in addition to the appropriations to be made by States or corporations, will give us a water communication from the Mississippi to the Atlantic ocean. It is time that this demand should be made, and time that it should be responded to by Congress. Sir, Illinois demands it; the great Northwest, that is now paying its millions of dollars annually into the Treasury of the United States, demands it; the great middle States demand it; New York demands it. This demand should be heeded by Congress. No petty jealousy that can be engendered by one section against another should be allowed to sway the better judgment of any man upon this floor. It is time that we should be acknowledged as one nation, having a common interest: the promotion of the general welfare of the whole people. We should come here not to legislate for New England, for Pennsylvania, for New York, or any other State exclusively; but we should stand here ready to appropriate money for Nevada, for California, for Oregon, or any other portion of the United States where an appropriation may be demanded by the best interests of the whole people.

Sir, take in my own district the product of one single article, which is recognized, at any rate, by this Government as legitimate, if it is not by those who are very great sticklers for moral reform, the production of high wines. The production of high wines alone consumes in the city of Peoria from three to five million bushels of grain annually; and but for the fact that that manufacture is carried on there, this corn might rot in the granaries of the farmer. We reduce the bulk of the corn by putting it into high wines, and in that manner we can, to some extent, reduce the cost of transportation between Peoria and New York. From the manufacture of that article alone, the United States Treasury has already since the internal revenue act has gone into operation, reaped a revenue of about five million dollars; and whenever the present stock on hand, which has worried my friend from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] so much, shall be consumed, the establishments in Peoria alone will produce sufficient high wines to pay, at the rate of two dollars per gallon, a tax of $10,000,000 annually into the Treasury of this Government. That is for only one district, and only one article. And is it to be said that this Congress will vote down the amendment of the gentleman from the Chicago district, [Mr. ARNOLD,] when it is shown that $5,000,000, one half the amount that is paid into the Treasury annually by the single city of Peoria, will build you a canal; and improve the navigation of the Illinois river from the Mississippi to Lake Michigan, where you can pass your gunboats, your transports, and your munitions of war, forever free? Why, sir, this is, upon the part of the State of Illinois, a grand offer to the Government. This, sir, is but a paltry and niggardly sum in view of the enormous benefits that are to result from the appropriation.

Now, sir, I have said this much with regard to this proposed improvement merely in a commercial point of view, a point of view which looks to the promotion of the pecuniary welfare of the people. In a military point of view it is, perhaps, of equal importance; and I know it is of equal importance if we should become involved in a war with Great Britain. I have seen it stated that the British Government has already ordered thirty gunboats to be built, in view of the troubles which are about to arise, or which, at least, are threatening in the horizon between this country and Canada. It may not be true; but after the abrogation of our treaty with them in reference to the amount of naval force to be maintained on the lakes by either party, Great Britain could and probably would put upon every lake a powerful fleet.

Now, build the Niagara ship-canal, and where are the gunboats to come from? You have got to build them unless you give us the Illinois improvements. Give us that canal, and the gunboats are ready to be transferred from the Mississippi to any of the lakes anywhere on that line of communication. What are you going to do with the gunboats already floating upon the waters of the Mississippi, and which have achieved so much toward crushing out this rebellion? Are you going to suffer them to rot? But those gunboats will be of no earthly service upon the western waters. What is to be done with them? Are they going to lie like lifeless hulks at the levee and rot in the sun; or are you going to act with foresight, and wisdom, and make these appropriations not only for the Niagara ship-canal, but also for the Illinois and Michigan canal, so that these gunboats may be used not only on the Mississippi but upon the waters of the great lakes?

Mr. MOORHEAD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he thinks that those gunboats on the Mississippi river would answer for the navigation of the lakes; whether they would stand a storm there, and, indeed, whether they could be used there at all.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think they could be used there, and I will tell the gentlemen how. I have no idea that there would be a raging storm on the canal, and therefore I believe they could go as far as Chicago, at least. The gentleman will probably agree with me in that. And Chicago is the western metropolis and is to-day vying with the metropolis on the Atlantic coast. Chicago is a metropolis worth defending. At that place is stored at all times millions of grain, the product of the western States. That place is worth being defended; and these very gunboats and other gunboats upon the Atlantic coast can be transferred to Chicago, Cleveland, Toledo, and other places on the lakes which are of sufficient importance to demand defense. I believe that most of the gunboats built on the Mississippi river might be used to advantage on the lakes.

Mr. ARNOLD. For all purposes of harbor defenses on the lakes those boats would be perfectly suitable. Many of them are suitable for the navigation of the lakes at any time, as those familiar with them are well advised. I would ask the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLOW,] who is conversant with the subject, if I am not correct.

Mr. BLOW. I would remind the gentleman from the Pittsburg district, [Mr. MOORHEAD,] that two of the finest vessels now floating were built on the Mississippi, and are now off Mobile; and that to one of them that great naval victory achieved under Admiral Farragut is to be attributed. It was the Chickasaw, a two-turreted monitor, which threw the shell which disabled the Tennessee. Those two vessels went down the Mississippi, passed around into the Gulf, anchored in front of the fort, ran past the fort, and attacked the Tennessee, which surrendered to the flag of our country. I would also state further that they were built six miles below the city of St. Louis, that they are sea-going vessels, and of course adequate to the navigation of the lakes, and, as I believe, to the defense and protection of the ports upon the lakes.

Mr. ARNOLD. The Secretary of the Navy states that all these vessels can be transported to the lakes by the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan canal.

Mr. MOORHEAD. One word more. I do not desire to embarrass this bill, but the members of the House who were here when this matter was discussed a year ago will recollect very well that we had the testimony of Commodore Foot, and other gentlemen who knew all about this subject, stating explicitly that these river boats could not live through a storm on the lakes; that they were not intended for lake navigation, and could not be used there. At that time I took the liberty of denouncing this scheme as useless if it was meant as a military necessity to take gunboats from the river and put them on the lakes. I admit that this is a great commercial project, and I have no desire to oppose it; but I do not want it to be voted for here under false pretenses. There is no object in having a canal for the purpose of bringing gunboats from the Mississippi river that could not live on the lakes and could not be used there.

Mr. ARNOLD. In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will read the statement of the Secretary of the Navy on this subject. He says:

"The United States have at this time one hundred naval vessels on the Mississippi and its tributaries. Steamers of iron will endure for years in fresh water, and the naval vessels which the Government may place on these rivers will be preserved. Should the projected water communication connecting the northern lakes with the Mississippi by an enlarged ship-canal be carried into effect, the Mississippi squadron could be made available for the defense of our northern frontier when circumstances require it. This squadron carries four hundred and sixty-two guns and five thousand five hundred men."

That is the statement of the Secretary of the Navy upon this identical question and about these identical vessels.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, I had not looked for any objection from Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania can afford to be even prodigal just now. I understand they have "struck it" [Laughter.] From that one source alone Pennsylvania has been enriched nearly sixty-five or seventy million dollars, and has a source of wealth that appears to be inexhaustible.

Mr. STEVENS. I would say to the gentleman that we lost more than that by the taking off of the duty on railroad iron last year.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] inform the House what the profit of Pennsylvania was upon her iron trade before the duty was taken off?

I do not envy the prosperity of Pennsylvania, but I believe it is true that Pennsylvania, from her iron, her coal, and her oil, has made herself one of the richest States in this Union.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Except, if the gentleman will allow me, for her canals, which have swamped her with $40,000,000 of debt.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, she is able to pay it. If she is not I will help her to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. She is, and I am glad of it, by reason of her iron, her coal, and her oil.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What would Pennsylvania be to-day without the railroads and canals which she now has? Without these her mines of wealth would lie hidden in her bosom.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman make the inquiry of me what she would be?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I mean in an agricultural point of view.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I shall have to call for a division of the question. The experience of Pennsylvania has shown her that canals never can compete with railways.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is not the experience of New York. Nor is it the experience of Illinois.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will allow me to state further that we had to give away part of our canals to somebody who would build the balance.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am not surprised at that. Pennsylvania is not essentially an agricultural State, and they have not much to transport except iron and coal and petroleum.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. That rather contradicts the compliment which the gentleman has paid to the wealth of my State.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Not at all. I make the exception in favor of your oil, of your iron, and of your coal; and I only hope that the source of your oil may never fail, that your mines of iron will never be exhausted, and that you will go on prospering and to prosper until Pennsylvania has more money than the national debt amounts to to-day; and I hope, in addition, that Pennsylvania may ever be like the widow's cruse, never failing to furnish the oil. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether or not he is acquainted with the widow, or whether he knows anything about her oil jug? [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Illinois is not bound to criminate himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am obliged to my friend from Ohio, and I will avail myself of his point of order. If there is anything that is detestable and worthy of condemnation, it is the miserable State prejudices that have been cultivated in this country under the idea of State rights and State sovereignty; an idea which has led to this terrible rebellion. I want no more of it. I want to recognize every member on this floor as a Representative of the people of the United States. I do not care whether he comes from the coal mines of Pennsylvania or the factories of Lowell. I regard him only as a Representative of the whole people of the United States, having at heart their interests and their advancement. That is why I say here to-day that I am for New England. I want to take New England by the hand when she says to Illinois "Stand by us," and we will stand by her; and all the powers this side of Pandemonium cannot make us consent to leave her "out in the cold." We will stand by the whole country, as the Army and Navy have stood by the whole country.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to inquire of my friend from Illinois in what manner he proposes to manifest his attachment for the interests of New England.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I propose to manifest my attachment to the interests of New England by defending her whenever she is unjustly assailed. I propose to defend the interests of New England as I would defend those of Illinois: by imposing no burden on Massachusetts which I would not impose on Illinois.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to inquire of my friend whether he proposes to stand by New England by surrendering all her industrial interests to the competition of the Old World.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir; I do not.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1865.

NEW SERIES....No. 35.

Mr. DAWES. Then I trust my friend will reform his votes. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. What one, sir?

Mr. DAWES. On the paper question. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will say to my friend from Massachusetts that in voting for the reduction of the duty on paper I have stood by the people of Massachusetts and against her incorporations. I have voted, perhaps, against the interests of the gentleman, as I believe he is a manufacturer of paper, [laughter] or interested in it; but I have voted for the interests of his constituents, and I propose to do so all the time.

Mr. DAWES. If my friend does not understand the interests of New England any better than his last remarks indicate, I hope that he will spare us any further defense of the interests of New England. [Laughter.] We can get along better without his defense.

Mr. INGERSOLL. So far as my friend from Massachusetts constitutes the people of New England, I will accept his suggestion; but so far as the people are concerned, I will not accept it. They are also my people.

Mr. DAWES. I want to say to my friend that my constituents understand their interest a great deal better than he does.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I thought the gentleman was going to say "a great deal better than their Representative in Congress." [Laughter.]

Mr. STROUSE. I admire the gentleman's patriotism and his being opposed to having any portion of our Union left out in the cold. He says that New England shall never be left out in the cold. Sir, I am a friend of the industry of New England. I admire her industry, her energy, and her prosperity, and she shall not be left out in the cold as long as I represent the tenth district of Pennsylvania, for we have coal enough in that district to warm her and to heat her for years to come.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, I am very glad to hear it, [laughter], and I hope my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STROUSE] will unite with us—the friends of progress and the friends of the people—against the monopolists of the country, and provide the means of cheap transportation for his coal to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and his people.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday was the grandest day that ever dawned upon the American continent—that is to say, the grandest for the people and for those Representatives who stood by the people. And to-day may be made another grand day in the history of our country, by aiding our national prosperity, in aiding the people against the monopolists of the country in giving them a cheap means of communication between the western States and the Atlantic seaboard; by voting this miserable little appropriation, in order that we may have a canal around the falls of Niagara, and be independent of Canada and Great Britain. Let us be independent of all your reciprocity treaties. We have got the wealth, at least the gentlemen who oppose us on some questions in this House will admit that if we have not got the wealth we have the greenbacks. Let us make this appropriation to build this ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, and show by works and deeds something of the American character, by maintaining American independence. Let us weld the East and the West together by means of this Illinois canal, by these mutual acts of assistance which benefit alike all sections. Let us do this and the people will thank us. Railroad corporations will howl, I know, because they must come in competition with canal-boats between Chicago and New York; but let them howl, and while the railroad corporations and the railroad monopolists howl, the teeming millions that enrich this country, the teeming millions east and west, the industrial men of all sections of the country will rejoice, because the sun of their prosperity is rising above the horizon, and approaching the zenith, and that, too, by the aid of their own Representatives in Congress.

I believe that the people of this country are in favor of this appropriation. The constituents of every member here, those who are high-minded and honorable, will say, "Vote for both of these appropriations for the good of the country; we have to support and maintain this Government; give us every means of doing so." The people must pay the taxes, and must maintain the honor and credit of the country. How are they to do that? They must do it by having increased stimulus, by having additional means of transportation from the great producing West to the consumers of the Atlantic States and the consumers of the Old World. Do this; do it to-day, and the country will again be proud of you, and of us, as I hope they may ever have occasion to be.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN addressed the House. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, obtained the floor.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. It was my desire, unless the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] desired to reply to me briefly, to move the previous question on the amendment and let this question be determined. There are but thirty days of the session left.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I do not design to enter into a general discussion of the question of internal improvements, nor do I design to consider whether it is proper for this Government to make an expenditure of this amount of money for this purpose. I come to what I consider the real point, and which has not been referred to here, and that is, whether we are able to expend this money now. I have at my home letters telling me that officers of the Army have failed to receive any pay since the 31st of August last, and yet gentlemen come here and ask us to advance the money for the construction of this work at a time when we are unable to fulfill our obligations and carry out our contracts. I am surprised at it.

Sir, as my own State has been referred to here, I may be permitted to allude to our experience in this matter. I can tell gentlemen that we have been swept into overwhelming debt by just such propositions as this. Sir, you cannot make water run up a hill, and you cannot spend more money than you have without running into debt, and I want to guard against that.

I admire the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] for his special devotion to the interests of his constituency, and I admire the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLEJOHN] for not forgetting Oswego, but my action must be governed by the experience of the past. I must act, not as a Pennsylvanian, but as one having an eye to the financial condition of the country. What is proposed here? While the original bill only asks for $6,000,000, we have here a rider to it calling for $5,000,000 more. I should be disposed to vote for the rider in the hope of killing the bill; but in order to be consistent, I prefer to vote against both as improvident expenditures.

Mr. JENCKES. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. LITTLEJOHN], who recently had the floor, stated that there were some here who, although in favor of all these propositions, would yet be obliged to vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ARNOLD.] I am one of those, although I am in favor of all these propositions. If it were a time of profound peace, whether the Treasury was full or empty, I should vote to loan the credit of this Government to improve all our great natural highways for the purpose of accommodating traffic and commerce.

But it seems to me that in the debate on this question the point on which the amendment of the gentleman from New York rests has been departed from. We are not now legislating for internal improvements. We are not legislating, in the spirit of this bill, for the purpose of promoting commerce, but for the purpose of national defense. And the question which must arise at the outset is this: why is it that, in this time of war, when our expenditures are so enormous, any private company actually formed or that may be formed in the future, or why any friends of such a company should come to Congress and ask for a loan of the credit of the Government to build its works, whether railroad or canal?

My reason for supporting the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLEJOHN] is that the work which it proposes is a measure of defense, and, so far as this Congress is concerned, of defense alone. We find ourselves with one formidable war on hand, and we have been threatened with war from another quarter. Its signs have not yet disappeared. They are renewed almost with every steamer that crosses the Atlantic. If war should break out, we find a coast of three thousand miles in extent entirely undefended. We must build and maintain a fleet on the lakes. The Mississippi fleet is not adapted to the navigation of the lakes, even if it could be transported thither. A sea-going fleet is not adapted to the navigation of the lakes. We must have on the lakes a fleet ample for the defense of the cities on their margin, and of their commerce. That fleet must be a lake fleet. As the gentleman from New York has well said, build this canal or aid private enterprise in building it, and the lakes are one sea. You have but an expenditure for one fleet on them where otherwise—the falls of Niagara intervening—you must have two fleets.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is no necessity, in the present exigency of this war or of our foreign relations, for this Government to pledge its credit for the construction of canals between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi, or for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi or any other river. These things must be done by private enterprise; or, in due time, the Government may come to the aid of private enterprise. So far as I am concerned, I would be willing at all times to concede that. But, with this Niagara ship-canal we will have ample means of defense in case of a rupture of our peaceful relations with Great Britain. We have in the mean time a navigable highway, ample for the purposes of commerce, between Buffalo and Chicago and all the cities on the lakes. The Niagara ship-canal may never be used for the purposes of war. God grant that it may not be. But in the mean time the people of the West will have what they ask for, an ample highway for the purposes of traffic and commerce, and for the improvement and prosperity of the great West.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. I move the previous question on my amendment.

Mr. ARNOLD. I ask the gentleman from New York to withdraw the previous question.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. I will if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. ARNOLD. I will renew it. I propose to occupy only a few minutes.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. Then I withdraw it.

Mr. ARNOLD. I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from New York that every argument which he has presented in favor of a canal round the falls of Niagara operates with still greater force in behalf of the connection between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi. These works are not rivals. They are of the same character. They complete a great chain of water communication between the Mississippi and the lakes. So far as its military importance is concerned, the Niagara ship-canal will not enable a single gunboat to be placed on the lakes, whereas the Illinois and Michigan canal would open the lakes to a hundred gunboats. As a military measure, the Niagara ship-canal is therefore insignificant compared with the other. The one interests two of the smaller lakes, while the other interests all the lakes and the Mississippi itself. I will not detain the House any further, but will renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Speaker, what is the condition of the question?

The SPEAKER. At the last session of Congress House bill No. 126 was pending in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. That committee was discharged from its further consideration, and the bill came before the House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLEJOHN] moved an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the entire bill, pending which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] moved to add to the substitute. The pending question is on the amendment of the substitute, on which the previous question has been demanded.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I would ask if that cuts off any further amendment?

The SPEAKER. It does not; the previous question is now confined exclusively to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ARNOLD], and if the previous question is not again ordered, the substitute, as well as the original bill, will still be open to amendment.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the amendment of Mr. ARNOLD to the substitute proposed by Mr. LITTLEJOHN.

The amendment of Mr. ARNOLD was to add to the substitute the following:

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That as a military work, and to facilitate the defense of the northern frontier, and to enable gunboats and vessels-of-war to pass from the Mississippi to Lake Michigan, and to promote the commerce between the different States and the United States and foreign nations, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, fully authorized and empowered to deepen and enlarge the Illinois and Michigan canal, supplying the same with water from Lake Michigan, and to improve the navigation of the Illinois and Des Plaines river in such manner as to insure a safe and uninterrupted navigation between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi river, at all times during the season of navigation, for gunboats, steamboats, naval and war vessels of the United States not drawing over six feet of water, the plan of which shall be submitted to and approved by the President of the United States. The President may, and he is hereby authorized to, contract with the State of Illinois, or with any company incorporated for that purpose, to construct said works.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That to aid the State of Illinois, or such company as may be incorporated for that purpose, in the construction of said works, the sum of $5,000,000, in bonds of the United States, payable twenty years from their date, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, to be made and issued in the usual manner, the interest and principal of which said bonds to be payable out of any moneys to be hereafter appropriated by Congress, shall be delivered by the Treasurer of the United States to the State of Illinois, upon the following conditions, to be assented to by the Legislature of the State of Illinois, and which shall be embraced in a contract between the United States and said State of Illinois, before the delivery of any of said bonds, to wit: First, that the said canal and rivers, when improved, shall be and remain forever free from toll or charge by the vessels, gunboats, transports, troops, material of war, and other property of the United States. Second, the State of Illinois shall, by its Legislature, undertake and contract that that State, either by itself or through some company incorporated for that purpose, proceed without delay to commence, and, within a reasonable time, complete, the said canal and river improvements in such a way as to insure such navigation as hereinbefore mentioned between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi river. On compliance with which conditions, and in execution of such contract between the United States and the State of Illinois, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to issue and deliver said bonds in manner following, to wit: The amount of $500,000 in bonds shall be delivered upon the concluding of said contract with the State of Illinois; and whenever there shall have been expended upon said works the sum of $1,000,000, and the same shall be certified and sworn to by the chief engineer of said works, an additional sum of $500,000 in bonds, as aforesaid, shall be delivered to said State; and so on for every million dollars expended upon said works and certified and verified to the Secretary of the Treasury, as aforesaid, the sum of $500,000 in bonds shall be issued and delivered until the whole amount of said $5,000,000 shall have been delivered for the purposes of aiding in constructing said works as aforesaid.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 43, nays 99, not voting 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Bailey, Baxter, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Coffroth, Henry Winter Davis, Donnelly, Eden, Farnsworth, Grinnell, Hale, Hall, Charles H. Harris, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Julian, Francis W. Morris, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Orth, Perham, Perry, Pike, Rogers, Starr, Thayer, Voorhees, Whaley, Chilton A. White, and Yeaman—34.

So the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the substitute proposed by Mr. LITTLEJOHN.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. I ask unanimous consent of the House to amend the second section by striking out the words "Charles B. Stuart, of the State of New York, civil engineer, and in case of the death, or any disability, or refusal to act of said Stuart, then such other civil engineer as the President shall deem it expedient to appoint," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "two civil engineers;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President shall appoint a topographical engineer, to be associated with two civil engineers, to make such preliminary examinations and surveys, and from them shall determine and locate the route of said canal; and the said engineers shall make and file in the office of the Secretary of War a survey, map, and profile of said canal when thus located, and before the work thereon shall be commenced.

I do this at the request of several members. It is due to Mr. Stuart to say that his name was placed in the bill without his knowledge, or consent, or desire.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Would it be in order to move to insert "League Island?" [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Not at this stage.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Then I must object to any amendment.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. Then I will move the amendment and have a vote of the House upon it. And I now call the previous question upon the bill and the pending amendments.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] was rejected; and I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. FARNSWORTH called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon laying the motion to reconsider on the table; and it was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. PRUYN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLEJOHN] will waive their motions and let this subject go over.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. I cannot consent to that.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the motion to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BROOKS. I would inquire what effect an adjournment would have on this bill.

The SPEAKER. It will come up to-morrow morning, immediately after reading the Journal.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. Is there no privileged subject that will have precedence?

The SPEAKER. A report of a committee on conference is the only matter that will take precedence.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. I understand that there is a conference report to be made in the morning. I trust the friends of this measure will dispose of it now.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn; and upon a division—yeas 40, nays 80—it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, to lay the whole subject on the table.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 95, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Blow, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Holman, Philip Johnson, Kelley, Knapp, Lazear, Le Blond, Loan, Long, William H. Miller, James K. Rollins, Smith, Starr, Thayer, Voorhees, Whaley, Chilton A. White, and Yeaman—36.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered, there being on a division—yeas eighty-eight, nays not counted.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. LITTLEJOHN to the substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The substitute as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended and the preamble were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 95, nays 51, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Bailey, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Edgerton, Eliot, English, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Charles H. Harris, Holman, Philip Johnson, Knapp, Lazear, Le Blond, Loan, Long, William H. Miller, James K. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pike, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Scofield, Scott, William G. Steele, Stiles, Thomas, Tracy, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, Webster, Joseph W. White, Williams, and Benjamin Wood—51.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Anderson, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cox, Henry Winter Davis, Deming, Dumont, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, William Johnson, King, Law, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, Moorhead, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Orth, Perham, Perry, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Smith, Starr, Thayer, Voorhees, Chilton A. White, and Yeaman—36.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ILLINOIS SHIP-CANAL.

The SPEAKER. The next bill in order is the bill (H. R. No. 322) for the construction of the Illinois ship-canal, which was postponed till to-day immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. ARNOLD. I move the following as a substitute, on which I demand the previous question:

That as a military work, and to facilitate the defense of the northern frontier, and to enable gunboats and vessels-of-war to pass from the Mississippi to Lake Michigan, and to promote the commerce between the different States and the United States and foreign nations, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, fully authorized and empowered to deepen and enlarge the Illinois and Michigan canal, supplying the same with water from Lake Michigan, and to improve the navigation of the Illinois and Des Plaines rivers in such manner as to insure a safe and uninterrupted navigation between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi river at all times during the season of navigation, for gunboats, steamboats, naval and war vessels of the United States not drawing over six feet of water, the plan of which shall be submitted to and approved by the President of the United States. The President may, and he is hereby authorized to, contract with the State of Illinois, or with any company incorporated for that purpose, to construct said works.

Sec. 2. And he it further enacted, That to aid the State of Illinois, or such company as may be incorporated for that purpose, in the construction of said works, the sum of $5,000,000 in bonds of the United States, payable twenty years from their date, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, to be made and issued in the usual manner, the interest and principal of which said bonds to be payable out of any moneys to be hereafter appropriated by Congress, shall be delivered by the Treasurer of the United States to the State of Illinois upon the following conditions, to be assented to by the Legislature of the State of Illinois, and which shall be embraced in a contract between the United States and said State of Illinois before the delivery of any of said bonds, to wit: First, that the said canal and rivers when improved shall be and remain forever free from toll or charge upon the vessels, gunboats, transports, troops, material of war, and other property of the United States. Second, the State of Illinois shall, by its Legislature, undertake and contract that that State, either by itself or through some company incorporated for that purpose, shall proceed without delay to commence, and within a reasonable time complete, the said canal and river improvements in such a way as to insure such navigation as heretofore mentioned between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi river. On compliance with which conditions, and on the execution of such contract between the United States and the State of Illinois, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to issue and deliver said bonds in manner following, to wit: the amount of $500,000 in bonds shall be delivered upon the concluding of said contract with the State of Illinois; and whenever there shall have been expended upon said works the sum of $1,000,000, and the same shall be certified and sworn to by the chief engineer of said works, an additional sum of $500,000 in bonds, as aforesaid, shall be delivered to said State; and so on for every $1,000,000 expended upon said works and certified and verified to the Secretary of the Treasury as aforesaid, the sum of $500,000 in bonds shall be issued and delivered until the whole amount of said $5,000,000 shall have been delivered for the purposes of aiding in constructing said works as aforesaid.

Pending the reading of the substitute, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House (at ten minutes before five o'clock p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 2, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs suggesting that an appropriation be made to enable his office to provide for the usual distribution of medals to leading and influential Indian chiefs; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs representing the necessity that exists for an appropriation to pay for supplies of goods purchased for certain Indians by him, the purchase having been made to meet the exigencies of the tribes occasioned by the destruction of previous invoices of supplies on board the steamer Welcome at St. Louis on the 15th of July last; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CREDENTIALS PRESENTED.

Mr. NESMITH presented the credentials of Hon. GEORGE H. WILLIAMS, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Oregon a Senator from that State for the term of six years from March 4, 1865; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOWARD presented five petitions of citizens of Michigan, praying for a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Fort Wayne, Indiana, to Jonesville, Michigan, and that the time for building the Amboy, Lansing, and Traverse Bay railroad may be extended; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented the petition of the chiefs and counselors of the Wyandott tribe of Indians, praying to be relieved from the payment of taxes assessed on their lands by the authorities of Kansas for the two years between the date of the patents and the organization of a State government over the Territory where they reside; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 424) to facilitate the collection of certain debts due the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 425) to revive for a certain time the provisions of the act of 1846 relative to suspended entries of public lands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION FIRE.

Mr. FOOT. I offer a concurrent resolution, and, presuming that there will be no objection from any quarter, I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, conjointly with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House, be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire into the origin of the fire by which the Smithsonian Institution building and the valuable deposits therein were, on Tuesday, the 24th day of January, in whole or in part destroyed; the approximate loss to the Government and to private persons; the means necessary to preserve the remaining portions of said building and its contents from further injury; and such other facts in connection therewith as may be of public interest, and to report by bill or otherwise.

QUOTA OF RHODE ISLAND.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish to the Senate copies of any correspondence that may have passed between officers of the Department and the authorities of Rhode Island relative to the quota of that State under the "Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces," and the acts in amendment thereto; also any reports and other papers in the Department relating to the subject.

TRIAL OF COLONEL NORTH.

Mr. WILSON. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate the record of the proceedings of the court before whom Colonel North, a commissioner from the State of New York in relation to the taking the votes of the soldiers from that State, was tried on charges of irregularity and improper conduct in reference thereto.

Mr. HALE. I do not interpose any objection to the consideration of the resolution, but I think we ought to have some policy in regard to these matters. Years ago the Senate used to refuse invariably to order these records before it. Subsequently to that, in some cases, it has ordered them to be sent here. If you order one, I do not well see how you can refuse to order others. There are some proceedings of courts-martial which, to my mind, are outrageous and enormous; but I had not thought of this mode of reaching them. I shall not oppose this resolution, but I simply want the Senate to understand what it is. We are to constitute ourselves into a sort of court for the correction of errors in the proceedings of courts-martial which are in constant session all over the United States. I have no doubt there is occasion for it; but it is contrary to the usual practice of the Government heretofore; and if we go into it the Senate will, perhaps, be precluded from attending to other duties.

Mr. WILSON. If there is any objection to the resolution, let it lie over.

Mr. HALE. I do not object.

Mr. WILSON. Let it go over, anyhow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be laid over.

THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I submit this resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be instructed to inquire as to the policy of organizing a territorial government for the country lying between Kansas and Texas, known as the Indian country, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think that resolution had better lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rules.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 403) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage immigration," approved July 4, 1864, and the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 161) for the relief of Josiah O. Armes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 70) to enable the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the claim of the State of Kansas, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 355) to amend an act to regulate the admeasurement of tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States, passed May 6, 1864, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 295) making additional grant of lands to the State of Minnesota, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 85) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certain bonds to the Secretary of the Interior, for feeding the refugee Indians, reported it with amendments.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 126) to construct a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 142) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Philip H. Sheridan and the officers and men under his command; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the Senate to take up the resolution calling on the President for information about peace commissioners which I offered the day before yesterday, and to which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] proposed an amendment. I wish to have it acted on now. We ought to have the information at once.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The unfinished business of yesterday was a joint resolution from the House of Representatives relating to the canvassing of the votes for President and Vice President, and I suppose that, as unfinished business, it would be first in order; it came up in the morning yesterday, and I should object to having it displaced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would be the first business in order to-day, unless the Senate continues its usual practice of being disorderly in its business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It would come up after the morning business, unless superseded by some other measure?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not ask to take up anything which will interfere with that matter. It ought to be settled, and settled at once.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not think this resolution of mine will take five minutes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it is a resolution of inquiry, and nobody objects to it, and nothing is to be said about it, of course I would have no objection to its being taken up.

Mr. SUMNER. It is simply a question between the Senator from Maryland and myself as to the form of the proposition.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he does not intend to discuss it.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am inclined to think that that resolution will give rise to discussion, because there is an amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland, which will probably lead to debate.

Mr. SUMNER. The question between the Senator from Maryland and myself is simply one of form, and my statement on that I can make in less than a minute. I will not transcend a minute, and will allow the Senator from Maryland five times that.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I desire is that I may be enabled at one o'clock to get the attention of the Senate to one or two bills from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I must insist on the order of business.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me to say a single word, there are other Senators who feel as much interest in the subject alluded to as the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Maryland, and desire to say something upon it. I propose to say something myself.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then it is manifest it will lead to debate, and the Senator from Massachusetts will not persist in it, I suppose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further morning business, the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday will now be taken up, being the joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. TEN EYCK,] to strike out the word "Louisiana" in the preamble.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Upon that question the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. HARRIS,] whom I do not now see in his seat, was upon the floor when the Senate went into executive session yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That has no reference to the order of business.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER.

Mr. POWELL. I move to postpone the pending and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 332, to provide for building a railway bridge across the Ohio. My object is not to urge its present consideration, but to make it the special order for to-morrow. It is a bill of very great importance to the public generally.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky moves to postpone all prior orders with a view of taking up the bill indicated by him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that will not be done. The Senator from Kentucky surely knows the importance of this resolution that we have reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. Let us dispose of that. It relates to a matter that is immediately upon us.

Mr. POWELL. I only ask to take it up for the purpose of making it the special order for some future day. I do not wish to press its consideration now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to that. The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. I now move that it be postponed to and made the special order of the day for to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that motion is put I desire to say that there are one or two appropriation bills that I feel it my duty to press on the attention of the Senate, so that they may not incumber us at the last of the session. I do not think this bill in regard to a bridge across the Ohio ought to be made a special order. It will give rise to debate. The Senator from Kentucky can call it up at any time without making it a special order. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will not make this bill a special order; as it may interfere with important public measures.

Mr. POWELL. If it interferes with the Senator's appropriation bills I shall not urge it on that day. I know the necessity of passing the appropriation bills, and I do not wish to antagonize this measure with them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Put it off to some day next week.

Mr. POWELL. Then I will move that it be postponed to and made the special order of the day for Monday next, at one o'clock, if that will suit the Senator.

The motion was not agreed to.

REPRESENTATION IN ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now insist on proceeding with the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. TEN EYCK to strike out the word "Louisiana" in the third line of the preamble to the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. It is proper, perhaps, Mr. President, that I should say that the question as to the power of Congress to legislate in relation to the counting of votes for President and Vice President was not considered by the Committee on the Judiciary. The question there was as to the form of the resolution and as to the recitals in its preamble. Since the discussion of this question in the committee, I have been led to doubt exceedingly whether it is competent for Congress to legislate at all in reference to the counting of the votes. The Constitution authorizes Congress to fix the time for choosing electors. It also empowers Congress to specify the time when those electors shall perform the functions of their office, when they shall vote; and, so far as I can find in perusing the Constitution, that is the extent of the power of Congress over the subject. It fixes the time when the votes shall be counted, and it declares that, in the presence of both Houses of Congress, the Vice President shall open all the certificates returned—it is careful to specify that he shall open them all—and the votes shall be counted.

I cannot find in the provisions of the Constitution any authority for Congress to pass a law (for this amounts to that) excluding any votes that shall have been returned to the Vice President. I do not see how it is possible. I am not prepared to say that in case the rebel States had sent votes here which would be controlling in the election, that in such an extreme emergency as that Congress would not be called upon to do something—what, I am not prepared to say; but in this case I am clearly of opinion that even though Congress may possibly have the power, it is inexpedient for us by legislation to declare that these votes shall not be counted. I doubt the power very much; but of the inexpediency of exercising any such power, if it exists, I am very clear.

I hope, therefore, that this resolution will not be adopted. I believe there is no necessity for it; and until an extreme necessity arises I am not in favor of exercising any such power. Whether these votes are counted or not, it is conceded the result will be the same. Why should we exercise such an extreme power as this, one so doubtful, as it must be conceded to be, to declare in an act of the national Legislature that the votes of a certain number of States shall not be counted? The power is not to be found in the Constitution, I am sure.

But, sir, if the Senate shall be of opinion that such a law as this is called for, then I am opposed to the recitals in the preamble to this resolution. It seems to me that these recitals are not strictly true. At any rate, I am not prepared to assert that they are true. It is true that the States specified did rebel; the first part of the recital is true; but that the inhabitants of those States and the local authorities of all of those States were in a state of armed rebellion on the 8th day of November, the day of the presidential election, I am not prepared to assert. On the contrary, I choose to leave that question open. I think it ought to be left open until the question as to whether or not the Senators who are now applying for admission here from the State of Louisiana shall be admitted shall be brought before the Senate. I do not like to have that question prejudged by a recital in the preamble of this resolution. I am therefore opposed to the resolution on both grounds. I think it inexpedient to pass any such resolution, and I am not prepared to assert the truth of the recitals in the preamble.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I can see very clearly that there is a great distinction between Congress exercising the power of legislation by providing in advance in what manner the electoral votes of President and Vice President shall be given, and a law of Congress which, after the votes are said to have been given under existing laws, by its retroactive effect declares that certain votes are null and void. The distinction is as wide as the world; it is as wide as the east is from the west. I concede that Congress could pass a law, and I believe such a proposition was pending at the last session of Congress, providing that certain States or certain people in a State of insurrection should not have the legal power to cast electoral votes for President or for Vice President; but no such law was enacted. The laws as they existed were permitted to stand; and now, after it is said votes have been given, for Congress to assume to declare that those votes are null and void, and shall not be counted, is altogether a different thing; and the point which was taken by my colleague when this question was up yesterday I think is fatal in that view of the case.

But, sir, I have very serious doubts whether Congress is clothed with any power over the subject of the counting of these electoral votes. The Constitution prescribes what powers Congress shall have:

"The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States."

In pursuance of that provision of the Constitution, Congress have passed an act on the subject, in the following words—

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the date of the act?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. January 23, 1845:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the electors of President and Vice President shall be appointed in each State on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November of the year in which they are to be appointed: Provided, That each State may by law provide for the filling of any vacancy or vacancies which may occur in its College of Electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote: And provided also, When any State shall have held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and shall fail to make a choice on the day aforesaid, then the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such manner as the State shall by law provide."

Here by this act of January 23, 1845, Congress did exercise the power with which it is clothed under the Constitution of determining the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they shall give their votes, which day, by the Constitution, must be the same throughout the whole United States.

What is the provision of the Constitution on this subject? The provision as it now stands is contained in the twelfth article of the Amendments to the Constitution, and is in these words:

"The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves: they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate."

The Constitution provides for all that, for the giving of the votes, for the counting of the votes, the sealing up of the votes, and the transmission of the votes into the hands of the President of the Senate. Then what is to be done with them? It does not say that Congress shall have anything to do with them, that Congress shall say what votes the President of the Senate shall count or shall not count, that Congress shall have any power to annul any one of these votes that are sealed up and sent to the President of the Senate. Congress is clothed with no authority whatever over the subject. They come to the President of the Senate. Certainly it will not be said that the House of Representatives have any control over the President of the Senate, but the House of Representatives are essential to constitute a Congress. Possibly you might argue that because they are sent to the President of the Senate, the President of the Senate presiding over the Senate, he might in some measure, by appeal or otherwise, be subjected to the decision of the Senate; but certainly the House of Representatives has no control over it. But then the Constitution provides:

"The President of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives"—

The Senate and House of Representatives meet together in joint convention, the President of the Senate presiding over the convention, and the Constitution then says what shall be done with the votes:

"The President of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates"—

Not open such as Congress tell him to open, but the President of the Senate shall "open all the certificates" which are sent to him—

"and the votes shall then be counted."

Here arises, Mr. President, under our Constitution, one of the most grave questions which, under certain circumstances, could possibly arise; and that is, whether the President of the Senate presiding over this joint convention of the House of Representatives and the Senate, is, by the Constitution, made the sole judge as to what votes shall be counted or not; or whether, being the President of the joint convention, he is in some measure, by some kind of parliamentary law not expressed in the Constitution itself, to be subjected to the control of that joint convention. Practically the question arose in 1856 on the vote of the State of Wisconsin. The law provided that the vote should be given on a certain day. In consequence of an extraordinary storm in that State, it was impossible to cast the vote on the day prescribed; the votes were not given on that day. The question arose whether the votes of the State of Wisconsin should be counted. Who was to decide that question? Who, in the first instance, was to decide whether the votes of Wisconsin were void or were good? Was it the Congress? Was the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate to report upon it and Congress to pass a law about it, to decide that the votes of Wisconsin were valid or invalid? Not at all. The Constitution says the President of the Senate shall open the votes and count them; and upon the President, in the first instance, is the responsibility. He, and he alone, is to decide. But then arises the other question, whether from his decision there is an appeal to the body over which he presides? That question arose in 1857. It was a grave question, and as it was not necessary that it should then be decided in order to dispose of the result of that election, the question was neither decided by the President nor by the joint convention over which he presided. The question was waived just as everybody and every judge and every tribunal who acts wisely will always waive a question when it is unnecessary to be decided. If, in the decision of the Dred Scott case, the court had only decided the questions which were necessary to be decided, we never should have heard of such an opinion as that which has convulsed the country from one end to the other by the dogmas that are contained in it and the unnecessary opinions that were given.

In 1857, whether the votes of Wisconsin were to be regarded as valid or invalid did not affect the result, and therefore the President of the convention declared that if the votes of Wisconsin were counted Mr. Buchanan was elected; if they were rejected Mr. Buchanan was still elected; and hence it was not necessary to decide the question whether they should be counted or not. So, too, in this very case, which is to come off in the next joint convention, we all know that whether the votes of certain States, Louisiana and Tennessee, are counted or not counted, does not affect the result; and it is not necessary for Congress now to assert a doctrine which in some future time may be the very destruction of the Government, namely, that a political majority in Congress can decide that certain votes of certain States shall be canceled and others shall be received. It will never do to set that precedent. We had better follow the Constitution as it is written. Let the votes that are sent to the President of the Senate be opened by the President of the Senate, who presides over the joint convention of the two Houses; and then, if it be not necessary to decide this question, it is better that it should not be decided any more now than it was in 1857. It will be time enough to raise the question in the joint convention; and whether that joint convention has, from the fact that the President of the Senate is to preside over it, a power of appeal from his decision, with a power to reverse his decision according to parliamentary law, or whether the members of both Houses are called there simply as witnesses to the fact, without the power of appeal from his decision, is a very grave question under the Constitution itself, upon which I do not propose to express an opinion.

Mr. President, as I said in the beginning, even if Congress had some power under the Constitution to regulate the manner in which these votes should be given, they have no power under the Constitution in this mode to annul votes or declare void votes that have been given. But, sir, it is not my purpose to take up the time of the Senate; I have simply expressed in brief words my opinion.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it is refreshing at the present time to hear anybody urge any special measure in a contrary direction to the provisions of the Federal Constitution. It seems to me that upon this question, if upon no other—a question upon which depends the continuance of the Government—it is necessary to adhere to the Constitution, and to look for it and see if we have any guide or direction in that instrument. I foresaw this evil, and I introduced at the last session of Congress a joint resolution directing in advance what should be done; but, for some reason or other, (owing to the press of other business, probably, certainly not more important business,) that resolution was not acted upon. It struck me at that time—and I have not lost any of the strength of that conviction now—that it was one of the most important measures that could possibly be presented to the consideration of Congress, and it was not then without the range of possibility or probability that on that question might depend the very continuance of this Government. No one could have known to the contrary of that at the last session; for let me suppose that the result of the presidential election might have been determined by the votes of these States who have now proposed to offer them. I think there are three of them, Tennessee, Louisiana, and Arkansas; let me suppose that, in November, the votes of these three States had decided which way the majority was, would the party against whom they voted have submitted? I tell you nay, sir. If the counting of these votes had determined the result of the presidential election it would have deluged this land in blood, and another civil war would have followed, just as certain as that we have one now on hand. My friend from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] shakes his head. Why, sir, what caused the present rebellion? Nothing at all in comparison with this.

My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] says that Congress has no power over this subject. It would be one of the strangest things that ever occurred on earth if it had not the power. The provision of the Federal Constitution is that no member of Congress or any person holding an office of profit or trust under the Federal Government shall be an elector. Suppose when the two Houses meet in convention to count the votes it is palpable to them that the electoral votes of some States were given by members of Congress, has Congress no power to say that they shall not be counted?

But, sir, the Constitution is not so silent on this subject as my friend from Wisconsin seems to imagine; for the election of President and the mode of counting the votes is one of the means and measures by which the national life is to be preserved. If this is not followed, carried out, and executed, there is an end to the Government; there is no President elected, and the whole fabric falls to chaos. Now, is it within the range of possibility or probability that the framers of the Constitution were so derelict, so blind, as not to have provided that there should be some mode of conducting, and conducting legally, the machinery of this great measure which is essential to the very life of the nation? No, sir. The Constitution would have been one of the most imperfect things that was ever created without some provision of this sort, and accordingly I find that the framers of the Constitution made the most ample provision for exactly this case. I find in the Constitution a clause declaring that Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States." Is not the power to choose a President one that is vested in the Government of the United States? It is the most essential power that there is; without it all the other powers are nothing; and the Constitution says that for carrying into execution this power thus granted Congress may make all laws which shall be necessary. It seems to me that it would be impossible to frame in broader or more comprehensive terms a provision which shall give Congress exclusive jurisdiction over this matter than that which I have just read, and it is found on the 10th page of Hickey's Constitution.

Well, sir, what would be the common sense, and what the reason of the thing? What does Congress meet for when the votes are counted? Is it to see as a matter of curiosity how the thing is done? Is it to go there to see the Constitution trampled upon and not have the power to remedy it? Is it when they see that there is danger of the Constitution being violated, that they shall not provide by law against it? It seems to me that to say that Congress has no power, is to say that the Constitution itself is a dead letter, inoperative, and of no force.

I remember very well, Mr. President, and you probably remember it, although at this moment I do not recollect whether you were present or not, the occurrence that took place in 1857 on the counting of the votes. I remember that I was then utterly astonished at the announcement made by some of the Senators, who are not now members of the body. I may name Mr. Mason of Virginia, and I think others concurred with him, who expressed themselves utterly indignant that there should be any attempt to settle anything in that joint meeting. "State rights" reared up its hydra head, and was shocked at the idea of State sovereignty being trampled under foot by the doctrine of the supremacy of a majority, and so nothing was done; the thing passed over.

Now, I contend that it is the part of wisdom before the emergency comes to settle this question. There never was a more favorable time for its settlement than the election of 1856 presented, and there will be none more favorable than this election presents. It is the part of sagacity, of wisdom, and of patriotism, when we see that such a contingency as this may be fraught with the consequences of revolution to provide beforehand against it. There never was a time when you could do it, when you would be less liable to the charge of any sinister influence, because it cannot change the result, it cannot determine anything except to settle the principle; and then when an occasion occurs that evil consequences may follow from settling it one way or the other, here will be a precedent showing that Congress at a time when there was no inducement to anything but an honest and a straightforward decision of the case maturely settled it, and settled it in such a manner that the influence of the decision will be morally binding upon our successors, and will be preserved.

Mr. President, suppose that some of our Territories had organized a State government and were not yet recognized by the Congress of the United States; suppose that the young State of Nevada, which has lately done herself so much honor and the Senate so much benefit by sending to it the illustrious men that she has sent—suppose that Nevada, impatient of the colonial condition, had undertaken to cast her vote for presidential electors before she had gone through the forms of the Constitution requisite to constitute her one of the States of the Union, would it not be competent for Congress in that case to say that the vote of Nevada should not be counted? If not, there is no limit, no control, no jurisdiction anywhere to exclude the votes of any persons that may take it into their heads that they have a right to vote at the presidential election.

I was not much struck by the suggestions made by the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. HARRIS] that it would not be competent for Congress to exclude the vote of the State of New York. I have, I think, as high a regard and respect for New York as anybody in the world has, not excepting even the Senator himself; but that very thing has been done heretofore even in regard to that State. If the Senator will take the trouble to look at the table of electoral votes for President and Vice President, cast since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, he will find that at the first election, when George Washington was elected President of the United States, the vote of the State of New York was not counted; she had no voice in that election. The precise manner in which that was done does not appear; but I have before me the table of electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States for the term commencing March 4, 1789 and terminating March 3, 1793, and I find that the States which voted were, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, South Carolina, and Georgia. North Carolina and Rhode Island did not vote, because they had not then adopted the Constitution; but eleven States had adopted it, and New York was among the number; and yet for some reason which does not appear on the face of the table, the tremendous occurrence which the Senator from New York holds up to-day as such a bugbear actually occurred, and in counting the votes on that occasion there were no votes counted from the State of New York.

It is the dictate of the plainest common sense, independent of the constitutional provision, that there must of necessity be a power residing somewhere to preside over, rectify, and govern this whole transaction; and although it would have been wise in my humble judgment for Congress to have passed this resolution preceding the presidential election, it by no means follows that it may not do it now. This law is not subject to the reproach of being a retrospective or retroactive act. Congress does not propose to say that any State shall not express its opinion. All that Congress proposes to say now is that these States being in a condition where no valid, no constitutional election was held, their votes shall not be counted; and if we cannot do that, it seems to me that we are powerless to do anything.

Mr. TRUMBULL obtained the floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to say a word in reply to the Senator from Hampshire.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator prefers speaking now, I will yield the floor for anything personal.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from New Hampshire stated me rather strongly as having expressed the opinion that Congress had no power over this subject. I did aver that Congress had power over it, for the Constitution gives them certain powers over the question of choosing electors, but it limits that power. The Constitution says that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector." Now I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he believes Congress has power to appoint or to direct the manner of the appointment of the electors when the Constitution says that they shall be appointed as the Legislature of the State may direct?

Mr. HALE. Certainly not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. "Certainly not." The Senator agrees with me, then; there are certain powers that Congress have not got over this subject; but the Constitution goes on to say what power Congress shall have. "Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes" after they are chosen, "which day shall be the same throughout the United States." It does say in substance that Congress shall not do some things, because it provides that the States shall direct the manner of the appointment of electors, whether they shall be chosen by the people at large, or appointed by the Legislature, or chosen in separate districts, or in whatever way the State may direct. There is merely the power in Congress to determine the day on which they shall be chosen and the day on which they shall give their votes. When Congress has done that it has passed laws to carry into effect this power under the Constitution, and all the rest belongs to the States.

My honorable friend seems to condemn this doctrine for which I contend as if it was a part and parcel of that State rights doctrine which has involved the country in this civil war. I believe just as much in the rights of the States as they are secured under the Constitution as I do in the rights of the Federal Government as they are also secured by the Constitution. I believe in the rights both of the States and of the Union; and the party in this country that shall undertake to aver that the States have not rights secured to them under the Constitution will go against the whole history of this Government from the beginning. Such a party has had but a short history in the past, and will have a shorter history in the future, for when this war is over and the necessity for the exercise of tremendous powers by the Government to defend its existence in this conflict is past, I tell you that the doctrine in favor of reserving to the States all the powers which are secured to them under the Constitution will be the popular doctrine and the necessary doctrine to save the liberties of this people and of this country.

Mr. President, I am for giving this Government all the power which is conferred upon it by the Constitution, and not for giving it more. This country is too large, it covers too many and too varied interests, to endure the establishment of the doctrine that this is one consolidated empire, and that this Congress and this Government can exercise unlimited power of legislation over all the interests of this great people. But, Mr. President, while I say this and assert it, I am just as much opposed to the State rights doctrine run mad to Calhounism, and all the consequences that have followed from it, as the Senator from New Hampshire is or can be. Under the Constitution as it is I am for maintaining the rights of the States as they are secured by it, with just as much tenacity as I am for maintaining the rights of this Government against States or individuals when they undertake to rebel against it.

Now, Mr. President, what I maintain under this provision of the Constitution is that, after the votes have been given, there is no power in Congress as a legislative body to declare certain votes valid or invalid. Congress is not the tribunal to which the question is referred; but the tribunal to which it is referred is the President of the Senate of the United States presiding over the joint convention of both Houses. I admit that the President of the Senate has in his hands the power in the first instance to count or not to count the votes. He is to decide whether he is to receive the votes; in the first instance to decide whether they are votes coming up from States or from Territories.

The Senator put the question, suppose one of the Territories should send up votes, what would you do? I will take the case that he supposes and presume that the Territory of Montana should send up, sealed under the seal of the Territory of Montana, three votes for President and Vice President. The President of the Senate is to open the votes and count them in the presence of the Convention; but the votes which he is to count are the votes which come from States; and as he opens the votes coming from Montana he says, "These are not votes of a State; this is a Territory claiming to be a State; I do not count these votes;" and then arises another question. Suppose some other person should insist in the Convention that Montana instead of being a Territory was a State, perhaps he could raise the question then on an appeal from the decision of the President to the joint body in Convention assembled, the Senate and House of Representatives. There is the tribunal. There the President of the Senate alone counts the votes, or it is the body over which he presides, having a power over his decision by appeal in the final resort, to decide the question. That is what I have contended for.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not suppose when the Senator from Wisconsin insisted upon taking the floor, that he designed making a speech on the question generally, but I thought it was merely to reply to some remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will say to my honorable friend that I had spoken on this question and the Senator from New Hampshire went into a long speech in reply to me, and I replied to him taking up some of the points that he discussed. I did not intend, of course, to trespass on my friend from Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am sorry, Mr. President, to see any manifestation of feeling on the part of any member of the Senate in reference to this question; it is not one to excite any.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My honorable friend does not understand that I manifest any personal feeling toward anybody on this question certainly. That I feel an interest in the question, as a grave question, I do not deny. I take an interest in all these questions, and generally have feeling.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me to go on, I shall say nothing unkind of him, I am sure, and I did not suppose that he had any personal feeling in regard to any one. I thought he manifested a great deal of zeal, and I admit I was a little afraid that his zeal might run away with his better judgment.

Now, sir, this is a question that no one, I apprehend, can have any other desire than to have settled properly and rightly. I am a little surprised at the course taken by my friend from New York, [Mr. HARRIS.] He is a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and I certainly understand him to agree to this resolution as reported by that committee. However, he has a right to change his views, I suppose; but the matter was pretty thoroughly discussed in the committee, and I certainly did understand that he was in favor of the resolution, though I was aware he did not like the words of the preamble. That, however, we have amended.

Mr. TEN EYCK. In the absence of the Senator from New York, I beg leave to state that I did not understand him as agreeing to the preamble to the resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from New Jersey misunderstands me. I said the Senator from New York agreed to the resolution distinctly in committee. He objected to the preamble. Does the Senator from New Jersey mean to controvert that?

Mr. TEN EYCK. I do not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in order to refer in debate in the Senate to the proceedings of committees.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I intended to state the matter as it was. I was taken a little by surprise at the opposition manifested by the Senator from New York.

But, sir, both the Senator from New York and the Senator from Wisconsin doubt the power of Congress to pass this resolution, and they place themselves upon the Constitution. The Senator from Wisconsin insists, as also does the Senator from New York, that the Vice President, or the Presiding Officer of the Senate, is to determine this question in the first instance. The Constitution does not say that the Presiding Officer of the Senate shall count the votes even, and in the practice of the Government since the days of Washington till this moment the Vice President never has counted the vote. The Constitution says, "The President of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives," do what? "Open all the certificates." That is what he shall do. Then what follows? "And the votes shall then be counted." By whom? Another clause in the Constitution already referred to declares that Congress shall have authority to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect every one of the granted powers. The power to count the votes is given by the Constitution; the mode of doing it is not prescribed by the Constitution; but another clause of the Constitution says that Congress shall have power to provide by law for carrying into effect every provision of this instrument; and here is a provision of this instrument that these votes shall be counted; the manner of doing it is now determined by the Constitution, and it is clearly constitutional and proper for Congress, in the exercise of its authority to carry into effect the granted powers of the Constitution, to pass the necessary laws to count the votes, and Congress has done it from the beginning of the Government. If it were not so, we should have revolution at every presidential election.

Why, sir, is the ground to be assumed here that South Carolina in a state of rebellion against this Government, her people at war with us, and it being declared by acts of Congress a felony for any man to deal with those people, they being forbidden to come within our lines or our people to go within theirs, has a right to elect a President for us; and that we have no right to declare the mode of counting the votes so as to exclude her vote? Let me ask the Senators from New York and Wisconsin is the State of Louisiana to-day in any different position legally from the State of South Carolina, or are the inhabitants of Louisiana in any different position?

I have before me the statute of 1861, which provides that the President in a certain contingency shall be authorized to declare the inhabitants of a State in insurrection against the United States, and what then? "And thereupon all commercial intercourse by and between the same and the citizens thereof and the citizens of the rest of the United States shall cease and be unlawful so long as such condition of hostility shall continue," and all goods going into that State shall be forfeited. And yet, forsooth, when the inhabitants of Louisiana have been declared to be in this state of insurrection, when goods taken there unless under a particular license are forfeited by the laws of the land, and when an individual trading there is taken up and tried as a felon, we are told that we cannot determine by act of Congress that they cannot elect a President for us!

Now, sir, it is said that the votes of these States will not affect the result. That may be so; but we may know outside that it probably is so; but this war may last four years more. I trust in God it will not; I do not believe it will; but suppose it shall run four years longer, and the doctrine contended for here is to obtain, how do you know but that at the next presidential election your President may be selected by these very States in rebellion? Sir, I say to you here what I believe; that if the result of the presidential election depended upon the vote of Louisiana, I care not which way it was cast, if the pretended electoral votes of Louisiana were to choose the next President of the United States, after the 4th of March, decided either way, it would produce a revolution in this country unless you had some provision to settle it by law in advance.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is what I complained of, that the law was not passed in advance. This is retroactive, operating on votes already cast. If you want to provide by a general law for the future, and declare generally that States in insurrection shall be incapable of voting, that is another thing.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator admits that we can do that he gives up the power; that abandons the chief argument of the Senator from Wisconsin. If you could provide for it in that way, you can provide, when the vote is offered, for counting it or not counting it, and that is the proper time to decide it. Suppose some other question should arise in reference to the vote from the State of Wisconsin when the votes are opened by the Presiding Officer of the Senate on Wednesday next in the presence of the two Houses, how is that question to be settled? Does the Senator mean to say that it is to be settled by a vote in joint convention by appeal from the decision of the Chair? I understand him to say so. Why, sir, there is no such thing known to the Constitution of the United States as an act of a joint convention of the two Houses. They meet together, it is true; but the only mode to carry into execution the powers of the Constitution is by laws of Congress. They are not enacted in joint convention of the two Houses; they are enacted by the different branches, each acting within its own sphere and concurring in the passage of an act; and the only way that any question could be settled in joint convention would be, if a question arose, for the bodies to separate, and at last you would have to settle it by law or by the action of the two Houses in passing a concurring resolution.

But the Senator from New York thinks it inexpedient to settle this question. It is because of the expediency and the necessity of having it settled in advance, that I am urging it upon the consideration of the Senate at this time. How will you settle it when you get in joint convention? The Senator from New York proposes to count the votes. The House of Representatives have sent us a resolution in which they say the vote shall not be counted. Now, what is your position when the vote is opened from the State of Louisiana? You have a disagreement at once, and can you ever count the vote? I propose that we have concurrent action in some shape before the vote is opened; and I hold that it is entirely competent and proper to settle the question in advance; and it is not retroactive, it does not relate to the manner of casting the vote; and in this case I will state for the information of the Senate that the people of Louisiana have not voted for electors of President and Vice President. There has been no election of the people there voting for electors; but a body of men in Louisiana assuming to be the Legislature of the State of Louisiana have appointed these electors—a Legislature that was elected by less than nine thousand votes. About eight thousand of the voters of Louisiana, out of more than fifty thousand, chose what they call a Legislature, and that Legislature has elected certain electors of President and Vice President. There has been no vote of the people.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator, for information, whether the Legislature of Louisiana was authorized by the constitution recently adopted there to select electors in that mode?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not remember whether the constitution made a provision on that subject or not, and I do not know that it would be material.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It seems to me to be an important question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am unable to answer the Senator as to that question. I do not remember whether there is any provision in the constitution adopted for Louisiana authorizing the Legislature to choose the electors.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think such a provision is to be found in the constitution of any of the States; it is regulated by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The fact would be immaterial. I do not think there is any importance in the suggestion whether the constitution of the State of Louisiana provided for it or not. In fact I do not think the constitution of a State could provide for that. The electors in each State are to be chosen, according to my recollection of the Constitution, in the manner prescribed by the Legislature of the State, and therefore the State constitution could not regulate it. In reference to that constitution in Louisiana and its validity, and the recognition of that Legislature in Louisiana, the whole question is an unsettled one, upon which at this time I do not propose to express an opinion. We have pending before us, as is known to the Senate, the application of two gentlemen for seats in this body, claiming to have been elected Senators by the same Legislature of Louisiana which elected the electors. That question is yet undisposed of, and the view which the Committee on the Judiciary took in reference to this question was to report a concurrence in the joint resolution from the House of Representatives, changing the preamble slightly so as not to declare that these people were in a state of armed insurrection on the 8th day of November last. I was not exactly satisfied with the preamble, even as it now stands. I would have preferred it in a little different form; but a majority of the committee insisted upon it in the form in which it has been amended. I am not particular about it now, but prefer for myself that the preamble should be entirely stricken out. I do not care anything about any preamble. What I wish to get at is to dispose of the question as to what is to be done with these votes brought up from the States of Louisiana and Tennessee, for I understand Tennessee has sent a vote here as well as Louisiana. Whether the other rebellious States, or the inhabitants of those States declared to be in insurrection, have attempted to send up votes, I am not advised. The object which I have in view, the object which the committee had, was to settle this question and avoid difficulty when we come to act in joint convention in opening the votes; and so far as the preamble is concerned, for one I would quite as soon it was stricken out; but it came to us from the House of Representatives, and the committee thought proper to amend it, and the amendment has been made, and I am willing to take it the way it is, although I believe I should be better satisfied if there were no preamble at all.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, it is no doubt true that we are often wedded to particular forms of expression, which we have premeditated, attaching importance even to the forms, because we believe those forms are material to the substance which they contain and represent. Now, sir, in relation to the general principle of the power of Congress over this subject of voting for President and Vice President, I do not know any difference between the provisions of the Constitution in regard to it and its provisions on any other subject. I understand that Congress is clothed with power to make all needful laws to carry into effect the powers granted by the Constitution to this Government; and when the Constitution provides a mode of electing President and Vice President, I take it Congress have a right to make laws to carry those provisions into effect. I do not mean laws to contradict them; I do not mean laws inconsistent with them; I mean to make laws honestly and fairly to carry into effect the declared purpose of the Constitution. If a law was presented which was at war with the provisions of the Constitution, under pretense of carrying them into effect, there would be ground of objection; but I take it that any law not inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution and which really intends to carry them into effect, is entirely constitutional. The subject has been legislated upon, and necessity may show that further legislation is required.

With these general remarks I come to the consideration of this resolution. I have objections to the form in which it is. I have great objection to all particular legislation. I object entirely to legislating of and concerning any State whatever by name. I want all laws to be general in their operation, general in their application. I want them so made that every State shall become subject to their operation in a like contingency. Make your laws general for the United States, and provide that in such and such contingencies a State which falls within those contingencies shall be subject to the operation of the law now and forever.

There is one other general principle which should be borne in mind. It very much becomes us, for consistency's sake as well as our own general character as legislators, that we should legislate in view of the laws we have passed. We should shape our laws with a view to what we have already passed into law, not forgetting that, not overlooking it.

Now in relation to this resolution: its preamble declares that certain States, naming them, or the inhabitants of those States, were in a condition of armed rebellion, and have continued in that condition for a certain time, and then the resolution legislates of and concerning those States. I think that is all wrong, all uncalled for. Let it be remembered that in 1861 Congress passed an act making a large body of provisions for the collection of things which had then arisen. It is an act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes," which was approved July 13, 1861. In the fifth section of that act, drawn, as I know, with a great deal of thought and care, it was provided:

"That whenever the President, in pursuance of the provisions of the second section of the act entitled 'An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for that purpose,' approved February 28, 1875, shall have called forth the militia to suppress combinations against the laws of the United States, and to cause the laws to be duly executed, and the insurgents shall have failed to disperse by the time directed by the President, and when said insurgents claim to act under the authority of any State or States, and such claim is not disclaimed or repudiated by the persons exercising the functions of government in such State or States, or in the part or parts thereof in which said combination exists, nor such insurrection suppressed by said State or States, then and in such case it may and shall be lawful for the President by proclamation to declare that the inhabitants of such State, or any section or part thereof, where such insurrection exists, are in a state of insurrection against the United States; and thereupon all commercial intercourse by and between the same and the citizens thereof and the citizens of the rest of the United States shall cease and be unlawful so long as such condition of hostility shall continue; and all goods and chattels, wares and merchandise, coming from said State or section into the other parts of the United States, and all proceeding to such State or section, by land or water, shall, together with the vessel or vehicle conveying the same, or conveying persons to and from such State or section, be forfeited to the United States."

In short, a state of war was declared to exist in that event. It will be observed that that state did not make any law for the States which had attempted to secede and were in arms. It named no State whatever. It was a general law that when the people of a State are in insurrection and claim to act under the authority of the State, and the State authorities do not repudiate it and do not stop it, then the President may declare them to be in insurrection, and thereupon a state of war exists; and the Supreme Court of the United States, differing about the blockade question before that, all decided that after that act was passed the state of war was complete.

Now, Mr. President, in order to conform our legislative acts to that law which we have already passed and that condition of things which exists, I propose to offer a substitute for this resolution, which I shall presently send to the desk. The President's proclamation declaring certain States to be in a state of rebellion and insurrection, was duly issued under the law of 1861, which I have just read. That is all matter of public record. We know what the proclamation is. We know that it was issued according to law. It declared a state of war. The proclamation is before me, but I need not read it. It declares under the act which I have read, that certain States are in a condition of war and insurrection. Has that ever been changed? Have any States declared by that law and proclamation to be in this condition, ever altered their condition? The state of war certainly still continues.

In view of the statement which I have made, I propose in place of the resolution, which seems to me obnoxious to the objections I have made, to strike it all out, and also the preamble, and to insert simply this:

That the people of no State, the inhabitants whereof have been declared in a state of insurrection by virtue of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved July 13, 1861, shall be regarded as empowered to elect electors of President and Vice President of the United States until said condition of insurrection shall cease and be so declared by virtue of a law of the United States.

This is not a resolution declaring any State to be in this condition and legislating for any State by name, or making any distinction between particular States. It is simply a law in pursuance of the act of 1861, declaring what shall be the effect which shall follow a certain condition of things into which any State may fall. For the reasons I have stated, I desire that this substitute shall be adopted in lieu of the resolution. If put in this shape, it will be a statute declaratory of the existing law, declaring that States in such a condition have no power to vote for electors.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Committee on the Judiciary, I suppose from what I collected of their views, would have no objection to any change of phraseology of the resolution which will accomplish the object that the committee had in view and that the other branch of Congress had in view in adopting the resolution as it stands. The object of the committee in the report is to prohibit the counting of the votes that have been cast in the States there named, the committee assuming that the States there named are States in rebellion, and being States in rebellion are not authorized to vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

The honorable member from Vermont prefers his mode of accomplishing that end; but virtually it is the same, provided his amendment covers the case now existing; but I rather think the form of his amendment will be found to provide only for subsequent cases, and not for an existing case. It seems to me to be prospective in its provisions, and not retrospective. The case to be provided for is one which has already occurred. Nor do I see any material difference, or any difference in point of fact, between the preamble as it stands and the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Vermont. He objects—and in the general the objection is certainly well founded—that it is unadvisable to legislate for particular cases; but I am at a loss to see how in substance the particular case will not be provided for by his amendment. He refers to the act of July 13, 1861, under the authority of which the President was authorized to declare certain States to be in a condition of insurrection or rebellion, and he tells us, what we all know, that in pursuance of the authority so conferred, the President has declared certain States to be in rebellion, and those States are the very States mentioned in the preamble to this resolution; so that the only difference between the resolution as it stands, in this particular, and the resolution as proposed to be amended by the honorable member from Vermont, is, that the States are mentioned in the resolution before the Senate, and will be found mentioned in the proclamation to which the amendment and the Senator from Vermont refers.

But as I said in the beginning, as far as I am individually concerned I have no objection to such a change of the phraseology of the resolution as will accomplish the purpose, that purpose being to declare that votes cast by the States which are named in the preamble are not to be counted. Whether that is to be accomplished by naming the States, or is to be accomplished by referring to the act of 1861 and what has been done under that act, is to me perfectly immaterial, and, I think, makes no difference as to the effect of the resolution. But even if the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Vermont should be preferred by the Senate, I submit to him and to the Senate that it will be necessary to change its phraseology so as to make it very clear that it will cover the existing case.

The question, then, Mr. President, is whether Congress have any authority to legislate at all on this subject. I agree with the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and my friend from Vermont that the authority exists; and I was somewhat surprised to find that it was disputed by gentlemen of such distinction every way, and particularly in their profession, as the honorable member from Wisconsin and the honorable member from New York. The Constitution of the United States does not provide in any way a mode by which a contested election growing out of an alleged informality in voting, or an alleged illegality upon the part of those who voted, or an alleged incapacity on the part of those voted for, is to be decided. The honorable member from Illinois is right in saying that if we are governed by the mere letter of the Constitution in this particular, there is no power existing by which anything more can be done than to have the votes counted. He is right in saying that looking to the mere letter of the provision there is no authority given to the President of the Senate to count the votes. He is right, also, in saying that there is no provision in the Constitution which decides who shall declare the result of the voting after the votes shall have been counted. In relation to all these points the Constitution is silent; but the Constitution provides that certain persons shall not be voted for as President of the United States. No one who is not a native-born citizen of the United States, or who was not a citizen at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, can be voted for. Members of Congress and officers under the Government cannot be selected as electors. The States are only authorized to appoint through their Legislatures a number of electors equal to their number of Senators and Representatives. Now, if a person not a native citizen of the United States, or not a citizen in 1789, when the Constitution was adopted, is voted for as President, or if a member of Congress or either branch or an officer of the United States is voted for as an elector, or if more than the number of votes to which a State is entitled is cast, there is no clause in the Constitution which provides a mode by which these objections may be obviated. If the Vice President is to count the vote, and he is to decide the result, and is merely to decide the result, according to the words of the instrument alone, then he may declare that A B is elected President of the United States, although the whole country knows that A B was not a native citizen of the United States. So he may count all the votes of any one State, (for his function it is supposed is only to count;) he may count all the votes cast by the State of New York when, in point of fact, New York has cast more votes than she is authorized to cast under the Constitution.

How are these questions to be decided? As it is very clear that in the instances to which I have referred—and there are others—there is the absence of any authority given to the Vice President or to the two Houses when meeting in convention to decide them if they should arise, one would suppose—unless we are to remain without a President, or to have placed in the presidential office a man who is not eligible, or to have one placed there by votes which there was no constitutional right to cast—that there must be some mode by which those difficulties are to be obviated.

If there is under the Constitution no authority conferred upon the Vice President, or upon either House acting separately, or upon the two Houses when meeting in convention, and there must be an authority to settle these questions, or otherwise you visit upon the men who framed the Constitution the imputation of having been entirely unable to accomplish that work, there must be somebody, some department of the Government, vested with authority to provide for the exigency; and when you go to the legislative department of the Government you find that all legislative power is vested in the Congress of the United States, and you come to the conclusion that the Vice President has no power to cover the particular case when the votes are being counted, nor the House of Representatives, nor both Houses meeting in convention. Unless the work of the members of the Federal Convention has been very imperfectly accomplished, the power must be vested in the legislative department of the Government.

I never heard before—I speak it with entire respect to my learned brothers—that it was doubted that it was within the province of Congress to provide for cases of this description. The doubt was, and perhaps that doubt was well founded, whether votes could be excluded by either branch of Congress or by the two when they met in convention. Nobody supposed that the Vice President could exclude them. But I was about to say that I never heard it doubted before that such a contingency, as might well happen because of the manner in which the constitutional provision was framed, could not be provided for by legislation. Chancellor Kent, in the first volume of his Commentaries, says:

"The President of the Senate on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors, in the presence of both Houses of Congress opens all the certificates, and the votes are then to be counted. The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In the case of questionable votes and a closely contested election, this power may be all-important, and I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result."

He admits that it is in the power of Congress to legislate, and doubts only, whether in the absence of legislation there exists any department of the Government, or any officer of the Government, vested with power to count the votes and declare the result, and in relation to that he is only able to bring himself to state by way of opinion that he presumes the President of the Senate is to count the votes and declare the result. But he presumes that only in the absence of legislation. Legislation on the subject, therefore, according to the high authority of this distinguished jurist, is admissible, and of course within the power of Congress.

Now, Mr. President, the honorable member from New York—I do not understand my friend from Wisconsin as going to the extent of that objection—says that he denies to Congress the power to declare that the votes of any State are not to be counted. Does he mean to say that the votes of the States in rebellion are to be counted? I do not speak of Louisiana, because he may perhaps be able to except Louisiana out of the category of rebel States; but assuming now that there are rebel States, and assuming that Louisiana is one of the rebel States, does my friend from New York say that the votes of those States are to be counted? I presume not; and yet if we do not legislate upon the subject, where is the power to exclude them? The Vice President of the United States may think it his duty to count them; he may think it his duty, counting them, to declare the result of the election consequent upon that count; and it makes no difference that we know outside of the balloting that the result will be the same whether those votes are counted or excluded, the principle is the same. We are not to know, we do not officially know, what the result of the election has been. Who can know (officially, I mean,) how the electors have voted? There may be, for aught that we know, a contested election by the ballots, and the result of that contest may depend upon the counting or declining to count the votes from the rebel States. Everybody will admit, I am sure nobody more cheerfully than the honorable member from New York, that if in such a contest one citizen is elected by the votes of the loyal States excluding the votes of the disloyal States, and another is elected only by including the votes of the disloyal States, the first although receiving a smaller number of votes numerically, is to be declared elected. If we all think that, are we willing (not because we feel in doubt as to what would be the result in the particular case, but we are establishing a principle) are we willing to leave it to the Vice President of the United States to announce as elected President and Vice President two gentlemen who may be elected only by the votes of those rebel States? Everybody will say no. Well, if we are not willing to leave the power to him, and there must be such a power somewhere, unless the Constitution of the United States vests in him the power, and exclusively vests in him the power, why should we not at once by legislation guard against the possible mischief of such a state of things?

It is true that my honorable friends from New York and from Wisconsin, and that is my opinion as I am at present advised, think that the efforts of those rebellious citizens to take those several States out of the Union are legally imperfect; that is to say, in the contemplation of the Constitution they are still subject to the powers of the Constitution, and the war is being carried on for the purpose of making them yield obedience to the Constitution upon the hypothesis that they are responsible to all the obligations of allegiance. That is all true; but it is equally true that they are in a state of rebellion. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided unanimously that since the passage of the act to which my friend from Vermont has referred, the act of July 13, 1861, all the States named in the preamble to this resolution are now at war with the United States, and that the United States have not only the right but it is their duty to prosecute that war to a success by bringing them back, they being (not in a constitutional sense but practically) out of the Union. Now, is it possible that the inhabitants of a State thus at war with the United States have a right to vote in any Presidential election for President of the United States?

In the war of 1812 a portion of the State of Maine was taken possession of by England, and held from the month of September, or June, or August, I forget which, until the declaration of peace made by the treaty of Ghent, and it was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, in consequence of being so held, to be a foreign country for the time. Would my honorable friend from New York have said, if the whole State of Maine had been taken possession of by the enemy and held, that Maine, at a presidential election occurring during the time of that possession, could elect electors of President and Vice President of the United States, and that Congress was divested of all authority to exclude them? I am sure he would not; and what difference is there between a possession of that description held by force of arms by a public enemy in an international war, and a possession held by the rebels who have raised their arms against the United States, and taken possession of certain States, and held that possession by force of arms, claiming to be independent of the authority of the United States?

Mr. COWAN. I should like to hear the honorable Senator from Maryland speak to this question, which is involved in the last clause of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont: suppose the rebellion to be entirely suppressed, is it necessary then, in order to restore them to their rights in the Union, that we should enact a law that it was suppressed?

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not said that. That is stated in the amendment suggested by the honorable member from Vermont. I have not expressed any such opinion, and I am not prepared to say that I shall hereafter, when I come to examine the question thoroughly, come to the same result. My own opinion has been throughout that the States are not out in one sense; and if all the inhabitants of those States were now to throw down their arms, admit their allegiance to the United States, and elect their members to the Senate, &c., hereafter, after the rebellion was entirely terminated, perhaps they would be entitled to their seats; but I am not prepared to say whether I shall hold that opinion upon examination or not. All that I mean to say now is, that it is incumbent upon us to provide by law for a contingency which has now happened, although it may never happen again, so far as the particular effects are concerned; and it is now, above all, the best time to provide for it, because, although we do not know officially that it will have the slightest effect upon the result, we do know that there is involved in an exigency of that description very great peril.

We have now, thank God, as I think—I speak it with due respect to others who differ with me, and particularly my friend from Kentucky—got rid of the disturbing element of slavery as far as we can get rid of it, and that ended, and protection provided in the future against the peril consequent upon this particular clause in the Constitution looking to the organization of the Executive, I look forward to a perpetuity of the Union, and, certainly as long as it exists, the increase of its prosperity and power.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to add to the amendment that I have offered these words:

Nor shall any vote cast by any such electors elected by the votes of the inhabitants of any such State, or the Legislature thereof, be received or counted.

According to my view, when a state of war has been declared to exist, declared according to law, we cannot recognize a state of peace and reconciliation in any other way but by declaring it by law, or authorizing the President to declare it by law.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I am unwilling to give a final vote upon this very important measure without expressing my views upon it. I certainly regard it as a measure of very great importance, especially as a precedent for the future, and as indicating the opinion of Congress on the subject, to use a familiar term, of "reconstruction," or rather the rights of the States in rebellion. I do not doubt the power of Congress to legislate upon the subject of the counting of the votes in the convention which is required by the twelfth amendment of the Constitution. That provision declares that after the two Houses of Congress shall have assembled together, of course in joint convention—

"The President of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted."

There is no doubt about the duty of the President of the Senate on this occasion. It is simple and plain. The act which he is required to perform is the opening of the certificates. That is an especial duty intrusted to his individual care and charge, and one with which the two Houses, thus assembled, have nothing to do. I confess I do not doubt the power of Congress, should they see fit, to authorize the President of the Senate to count the votes after he has opened the certificates; but in the absence of such a statutory provision I certainly could not concur in the "presumption" of Chancellor Kent, that the President of the Senate would have the right to count the votes and declare the result. It is impossible for me to concur in this intimation of that very distinguished authority. I should, on the contrary, hold, in the absence of an act of Congress, that the duty of counting the votes devolved upon the two Houses of Congress thus assembled.

Why are they thus assembled? It is a maxim that the law never requires a nugatory act; it never requires the performance of an act which is in itself immaterial, useless, or trifling; and whatever it commands to be done is supposed to have attached to it importance and interest. Let me ask, why are the two Houses of Congress thus required to assemble in the same hall, sitting together, and composing, of course, one body? Is it for the mere purpose of acting as spectators of the process to be performed by the President of the Senate of opening the votes? Is that all?

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that if he will read the very next sentence in the Constitution he will find an answer to his question. They are to proceed, in case there is no election, immediately to choose a President.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall come to that in a moment. I am speaking now of the ceremony of counting the votes. Are the two Houses thus assembled to act as the mere spectators and witnesses of the ceremony of opening the certificates by the President of the Senate? Is that the sole and only office which they are required to perform on that occasion?

Mr. CLARK. I suggest to the Senator that it is only the House of Representatives that is to elect the President in a certain contingency named; it is not the convention.

Mr. HOWARD. I know that. I am coming to that clause. It seems to me, on the other hand, that the intention of the Convention which framed the Constitution was that the two Houses thus assembled should sit together as one joint body for a much higher purpose than merely looking upon the ceremony of breaking the seals of the certificates, and that they are really required to perform the office of counting the votes. This was the early construction given to the Constitution by the Second Congress of the United States, which passed the act of 1792.

Mr. CLARK. I hope the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, because I desire to hear him upon one point right here. I agree with him that the convention should count the votes; but I want to hear him on this point: if the convention is to count votes, how can the two Houses, sitting by themselves, restrict or enlarge that count by saying they shall count so and so, or only so and so? The Senator will get my point.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. Suppose there be an objection made in the convention.

Mr. HOWARD. I may best answer that question by putting another. Suppose that votes were found to be embraced in this certificate which were in reality void for fraud or deception; suppose they were a mere imposition upon the Vice President, and that the persons casting them were not really in existence, or that the certificate itself was a forgery. Is there no way to prevent the counting of such forged and fraudulent votes? And if there be any such mode, is not that question, ex vi termini, by the terms of the Constitution referred to this convention thus assembled together?

Mr. CLARK. I see the Senator has not got my point. I agree with him that there would be power to prevent the counting of such votes, and it would be in the convention; but not in the two Houses of Congress separately.

Mr. HOWARD. I am speaking of them sitting together in one and the same body.

Mr. CLARK. The point I made was this: if it belongs to the convention, the two Houses sitting together, to determine this question, how can it be limited or enlarged by the two Houses sitting separately?

Mr. HOWARD. Of course it cannot be limited or enlarged.

Mr. CLARK. That is the point.

Mr. HOWARD. I consider that the power of counting the votes and of rejecting votes which are void for fraud or illegality, is, under the Constitution, in the joint convention thus assembled. I have not any doubt about that, because I believe that the two Houses thus assembled are assembled for a great and protective purpose, that they are exercising the tutelary authority of the people in protecting the nation from the imposition of false and fraudulent ballots and certificates. The article proceeds:

"The person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President."

Did my honorable friend from New York forget that the Constitution in this clause only referred to the matter of the election in the House of Representatives? He seems to be of opinion that it was the duty of these two Houses thus assembled together, in case there was no election of President, to proceed at once to the election of a President. That would be a very strange proceeding indeed; the Senate manifestly would have no business to intermeddle with it. It belongs exclusively to the House of Representatives sitting, not in convention with the Senate, but in their own Hall as a distinct legislative body.

Mr. President, I regret very much that the Committee on the Judiciary saw fit to strike out the last clause of the preamble; and with the indulgence of the Senate I will state briefly what my views are upon this subject. I do not wish to consume their time unnecessarily, and will not; but the question is in my judgment one of the most important imaginable. The preamble to the resolution as it comes to us from the House of Representatives is as follows:

Whereas the inhabitants and local authorities of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee rebelled against the Government of the United States, and have continued in a state of armed rebellion for more than three years, and were in said state of armed rebellion on the 8th day of November, 1864: Therefore, &c.

It affords me a little gratification, I confess, that my learned friend from Maryland has at length found himself compelled to adopt the sentiment which I long since expressed upon this floor, that the United States, in the prosecution of this war against the rebellion, have the same power and authority over the conquered States, over the communities once States in this Union but now conquered and subjected by our arms as the nation itself would possess over foreign territory conquered in the same way. The only difference between the two cases is this: that in the case of a conquest of a rebel State by the arms of the United States the Government hold the territory thus subdued in trust for a specific purpose, and that purpose is to restore it ultimately and in its own discretion to its original position in the Union, to the enjoyment of all the privileges, and to the performance of all the functions pertaining to or required of a State of the United States under the Constitution.

By the act of 1861, and the President's proclamation under that act, the eleven States embraced in this preamble were declared to be in rebellion against the Government of the United States, to be in insurrection. Upon the principles of the laws of nations and the laws of war, principles which have been repeatedly recognized by our own Supreme Court, all the people embraced in these rebellious States, thus declared to be in insurrection, are enemies of the Government of the United States and enemies of the remaining loyal States and people. They are our enemies in every sense in which a foreign foe would be our enemy. Have such people any political rights under the Government of the United States? Have public enemies any right to enjoy the privileges of loyalty under the Government of the United States? Have they, in other words, the right of being the enemy and at the same time the friends of the United States? Can they have their cake and eat their cake at the same time? Can South Carolina rightfully, if her people were so disposed, proceed to elect electors of President and Vice President of the United States and forward to this Government a certificate of the election? Why, sir, the very fact that they are public enemies shows the utter impossibility and absurdity of such a supposition. The same principle covers not only South Carolina, but every foot and every inch of every one of these eleven rebellious States thus declared to be in insurrection; and that state of hostility will continue against the Government of the United States until our arms have completely triumphed, and until, in the language of my respected friend from Vermont, [Mr. TILAMER,] peace is restored by an act of Congress revoking and annulling the proclamation issued under the act of 1861. These communities have no right at all to enjoy the benefits of the Government of the United States further than we see fit to extend to them those benefits; and those benefits are conferred upon them and preserved to them, while the war shall last, by the points of our bayonets.

I look upon this measure as necessary, as one form in which the sense of Congress ought to be expressed against any hasty attempt to readmit these rebellious States into the Union. For one, I am prepared to say, and I take this occasion to say it, that I shall never consciously give my vote for the readmission, directly or indirectly, of one of these rebellious States back into the Union, either by way of admitting her Senators here or in any other form, until I am perfectly satisfied, upon due evidence, that the decided majority of the voting population of such State has become loyal to the Government of the United States, is friendly to that Government, and willing and anxious to proceed in the discharge of the functions of a State of the Union, honestly and fairly, as required by the Constitution of the United States.

The theory of our Government is different from that of almost every other Government on earth. It is that the will of the majority shall govern; in common phrase, the majority of the people, but practically the majority of the voting population. That is the basis, and the sole basis, upon which our republican system is based; and that is a principle too often recognized by our public writers and public speakers, too often recognized by our judicial tribunals, to need any discussion here. The moment we abandon the fundamental idea that a majority shall govern, that moment we place the government of a State in the hands of a minority, and so far as the principle is concerned, it is immaterial whether this minority consists of one tenth of the population or the one thousandth part of the population, or even of one out of the whole population. We may not discard the principle that republican government, as understood on this continent, rests upon the willing assent of a majority of the people of the particular community; a willing obedience to the laws of the United States, and a disposition for the future to proceed in the regular discharge of their duty as citizens of the State. If we abandon this great principle, that a majority not only shall, but must govern, we have thrown the leading principle upon which all our governments, State and Federal, are organized to the winds; we have given up the great experiment of republican government.

Mr. President, I repeat (for I do not intend to consume the time of the Senate) that I look upon it as the bounden duty of Congress, in every case, to keep out of the Union every one of these eleven seceded States until, in pursuance of our laws, passed or to be passed, it has become perfectly evident to us that there is in such State a clear, absolute majority of its voting population friendly to the Government of the United States, and willing to proceed in the discharge of their functions as a State; and, until that is done, you may be perfectly sure, so long as I hold a seat in this body, my vote will be given against any such proposal. I never will consent to admit into this Union a State, a majority of whose people are hostile and unfriendly to the Government of my country. I prefer to hold them in tutelage (for that is really the word) one year, five years, ten years, even twenty years, rather than run the risk of a repetition of this rebellion, which has cost us so much blood and treasure.

I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that this resolution will pass; and I hope it will pass precisely as it is sent us by the House of Representatives. I hope that we shall continue the language in this preamble, the recital that on the 8th day of November, 1864, each of these eleven States was in armed rebellion against the United States, which was the legal fact of the case. Why flinch from it? Why shun the declaration? Were they not our enemies?

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to remind the Senator that that language has been struck out on the report of the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. It is not struck out yet by the Senate. I believe it was stricken out in Committee of the Whole. I shall call the yeas and nays upon that question in the Senate.

Each of these States, sir, on that particular day was, as a political community, an enemy of the United States, and all their men, women, and children were enemies of the United States by the laws of war and the laws of nations.

This is all I have to say on the subject at present.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I am not in favor of the adoption of the substitute proposed by the Senator from Vermont, although it is always with the greatest diffidence in the world that I venture to differ from him in any well-considered proposition that he submits to the Senate. I understand his substitute to be based upon the idea that under the act of Congress and the President's declaration, we are now in an actual state of war with these eleven southern States, and that it will require an act of Congress to enable them to resume their position again in the Federal Union. That presupposes, in the first place, that they are out of the Union, a fact which I am not willing to admit and can never assent to; but I do not propose to insist upon that. The main direction of the argument is, that inasmuch as the President has declared these States to be in a condition of insurrection under an act of Congress passed in 1861, therefore it will require an act of Congress to enable them to resume their legitimate or ordinary State functions; or, in other words, it will require an act of Congress to authorize them to elect electors for President and Vice President, and, as a necessary consequence, to elect Senators to this body, or Representatives to the House of Representatives.

I do not mean to weary the Senate by reading at large the statute of 1861, but I may be permitted perhaps to refer to it for the purpose of showing the object, intent, and scope of that enactment. It is entitled, not "An act to declare war against the States of South Carolina, Virginia, and others," but "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes." The fifth section authorizes the President in certain cases to declare the inhabitants of certain States to be in a state of insurrection by virtue of the power conferred upon him by the act of February 28, 1795. It goes on to declare that it shall be lawful for the President, whenever he shall call forth the militia, in pursuance of the act to which I have referred,

"To suppress combinations against the laws of the United States, and to cause the laws to be duly executed, and the insurgents shall have failed to disperse by the time directed by the President, and when said insurgents claim to act under the authority of any State or States, and such claim is not disclaimed or repudiated by the persons exercising the functions of government in such State or States, or in the part or parts thereof in which said combination exists, nor such insurrection suppressed by said State or States, then, and in such case, it may and shall be lawful for the President, by proclamation, to declare that the inhabitants of such State, or any section or part thereof, where such insurrection exists?"

Not a state of actual war—

"are in a state of insurrection against the United States; and thereupon all commercial intercourse by and between the same and the citizens thereof, and the citizens of the rest of the United States, shall cease, and be unlawful so long as such condition of hostility shall continue."

This is the object of the act. When these people, in the opinion of the President of the United States, are in the condition specified in this act, he shall issue his proclamation declaring that fact; "and thereupon all commercial intercourse by and between the same and the citizens thereof, and the citizens of the rest of the United States, shall cease, and be unlawful so long as such condition of hostility shall continue."

In pursuance of that act of Congress the President issued his proclamation, and I shall refer to a portion of it. The proclamation bears the date of August 16, 1861. It recites the act of 1861 to which I have just referred; it also recites the act of 1795, under which he derives the authority, and then proceeds to declare:

"Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, in pursuance of an act of Congress approved July 13, 1861, do hereby declare that the inhabitants of the said States of Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Florida, (except the inhabitants of that part of the State of Virginia lying west of the Alleghany mountains, and of such other parts of that State and the other States hereinbefore named as may maintain a loyal adhesion to the Union and the Constitution, or may be, from time to time, occupied and controlled by forces of the United States engaged in the dispersion of said insurgents,) are in a state of insurrection against the United States, and that all commercial intercourse between the same and the inhabitants thereof, with the exceptions aforesaid, and the citizens of other States and other parts of the United States, is unlawful, and will remain unlawful until such insurrection shall cease or has been suppressed."

The object, design, and intent of the act was to prohibit trade with these insurgents, to prevent persons in the loyal part of the Union from carrying on commercial intercourse with them, and from furnishing them with provisions and munitions of war with which they might continue to prosecute this rebellion; and then there was an exception from the scope and effect of the act in favor of the State of West Virginia and such other States or parts of States as maintained a loyal adhesion to the Union and the Constitution, or may be from time to time occupied and controlled by forces of the United States engaged in the dispersion of the insurgents.

Now, if it comes to the knowledge of the joint convention to be assembled on Wednesday of next week that in either of these States this insurrection has been suppressed, and that the people of either one of those States have assumed the suspended functions of their State government, have reorganized a State constitution, have elected State officers, and have put their civil government into full execution and operation, and that fact comes before us attested and undisputed. I inquire whether, under the provisions of this law and the proclamation of the President, it is necessary that there should be an act of Congress passed in order to establish the fact that these people have reorganized and reassumed their ancient loyal functions? I am as much opposed as any other Senator can be to the admission of Senators from the State of South Carolina, if such a thing could occur, or to the electoral vote of the State of South Carolina being counted in the Electoral College; but, sir, if the fact appeared that that State, contrary to all its predispositions toward rebellion, had resumed its loyal functions under the ancient Union, and that there were a large body of loyal people there, sufficient for the purpose of performing all their duties under the State government and under the Government of the United States, even South Carolina, polluted and covered over as she is and has been with treason, might yet by possibility be permitted to resume her position upon this floor and have her electoral vote also counted in the joint convention of both Houses. Why, sir, I thought that this whole war, the expenditure of thousands of millions of dollars and of oceans of blood, was for the very purpose of restoring this Union and bringing back these shooting stars to their ancient orbits.

I differ with the Senator from Michigan, who would make the return of these States to the Union attendant with the utmost difficulty. Whenever I was satisfied that there was a true, genuine, loyal feeling among the inhabitants of any of these States to repudiate their heresies and return to their allegiance, and that there was a sufficient body of them to justify the proceeding, and to carry on all the essential, necessary operations of State governments, and to perform their duties within the limits of the Union, I should be disposed to extend the hand of encouragement to the loyal people, always saving and reserving not only terms of indignation for the leaders, but the privilege and firm determination of punishing in the most condign manner the guilty authors and leaders and instigators of the rebellion. I do not believe that there is any necessity for any such act of Congress as has been referred to. I do not believe that it is, at this time, under the existing state of things, prudent, advisable, or proper to throw these impediments in the way, to make the return of these erring States dependent solely upon the wish and will of Congress.

Inducements have been held out to them by the Executive of the United States. I know that that course of conduct on the part of the Executive has been criticised; yet, at the same time, these people, who have been like drowning men struggling in the midst of a storm, contending against their neighbors and their efforts to keep them in rebellion, have seized hold of this offer or inducement held out to them by the Executive of this nation, and have proceeded in the common, legitimate, lawful, and ordinary mode, in the mode in accordance with their ancient traditions, in accordance generally with their constitutions and the laws they had enacted in times past, to perform all the duties which good, loyal, and true citizens should perform, to manifest their devotion to the ancient Union, and to return to the ancient ark. Several of them have attempted this thing. Tennessee has made some effort toward it. Arkansas has made an effort toward it. I, however, having some familiarity with the case of Louisiana, saw fit to select that in my motion of amendment yesterday from the operation of this joint resolution, considering it, from the knowledge I had of the situation of these several States, as the strongest case that could be brought to the consideration of the Senate. It may not be so, but I so regard it.

I understood the Senator from Illinois to-day to take exception to the course pursued by the people of Louisiana. He wished to know if it were possible that some eight thousand votes cast in an election for the purpose of returning again to their ancient allegiance could be sufficient where the State had been in the habit of casting some fifty thousand votes in other elections. I do not understand the facts exactly as the Senator from Illinois understands them. I will read from a paper furnished by a gentleman who is familiar with these facts, and who has had something to do in attempting to set this new State government in operation. He states, in regard to the State election:

"It was fixed for the 22d day of February. Three candidates were presented, and the canvass was general and spirited, each party sustaining its candidates by public meetings, precisely in the same manner as in a State unaffected by the revolution.

"Eleven thousand four hundred and fourteen votes were polled at this election.

"The average vote for ten years previous to the rebellion in these parishes was fifteen to sixteen thousand."

Surely if the average vote in the parishes that voted at this State election in 1864 for the period of ten years past did not exceed fifteen or sixteen thousand, we may say that a full vote was cast by the people of these parishes in February, 1864, when they cast eleven thousand four hundred and fourteen votes, taking into consideration the wasting effect of war upon that people, and the fact that a large number of them had actually gone into the rebel army.

"The highest vote ever given [in these parishes] was in 1860, when the subject of the rebellion was considered, and the people were represented by four presidential candidates. The vote in that year was twenty-one thousand."

So that the votes cast in the State election of 1864 in these parishes amounted to more than one half the whole number of votes cast in the presidential election immediately preceding when there were four candidates running, and when the question of rebellion was being considered, and when it is fair to presume that every voter who could be brought to the polls was brought and his ticket deposited.

I desire now to give the statistics of the vote of the State generally for the purpose of putting the facts right before the Senate:

"The highest average vote of the State of Louisiana in ten years past was thirty-four thousand.

"The highest vote ever given was about fifty-one thousand.

"In ten years past the vote is even as low sometimes as twenty-two thousand."

"The ordinary vote of the city of New Orleans was six or seven thousand previous to the revolution.

"The highest vote ever given in the city was ten thousand.

"In these elections, therefore, the vote actually polled was more than one third of the average vote for ten years past."

I was anxious to save the State of Louisiana from the effect of this joint resolution. I feel as anxious to save the State of Tennessee from the effect of the resolution, because I cannot conceal the fact that the Vice President-elect of the United States is a citizen of that State. If that State be not a State in the Union, then he is an alien, and I do not see clearly how an alien can take his seat to preside over this body as the Vice President of the United States. Still, I did not see fit to start that question or to discuss it, because I had not fully looked into it and considered it, so as to justify me in attempting to detain the Senate in any remarks which I might make on the subject.

There was another view that I entertained of this case, and that was a motive which induced me to confine my amendment to the State of Louisiana. It was to avoid a commitment on the subject, and to save the Senate from declaring its opinion beforehand with respect to the eligibility of the Senators chosen by that State to occupy seats upon this floor. The Senator from Illinois differs with me. He thinks that by the passage of the resolution that question will be avoided, that we shall not be committed upon it. I do not think so. I do not say that that is a sufficient reason to regulate and rule the transactions of this body; and yet I think we ought not in advance to commit ourselves on this subject. Why shall we commit ourselves on the question? If we pass this resolution declaring that the State of Louisiana was in such a state of rebellion during the year 1864 that no legal election could be held there, and even as late as the 8th of November of that year, then we declare that the Legislature of that State, elected in February of the same year, was illegally elected. Then if we refuse by this joint resolution to allow the electoral vote to be counted in the Electoral College on Wednesday next, on the ground that this Legislature was illegally elected, we preclude the question in relation to the election of these Senators, because they were elected by the same Legislature, in pursuance of a law enacted by themselves, under the power conferred upon them by the Constitution to enact a law providing for the election of electors for President and Vice President of the United States. So far from avoiding a decision on this question, we, by our vote, if we pass this joint resolution, prejudice and predetermine the question in relation to the admission of the Senators from that State upon this floor, as well as the admission of the members elected to the House of Representatives.

I wish to avoid settling that question. It can make no difference as to the result. The choice of the people so clearly manifested during the last election will be acknowledged, and ratified, and carried out whether the votes of these States are cast in the Electoral College or not. I should much rather prefer leaving this question to be settled and determined, if it should arise, in the Electoral College, having faith in the good sense and honesty of purpose of the representatives of the people in both Houses, than to undertake to venture upon a doubtful power, claiming that the Congress, and the Congress alone, have the power to determine this question, and at the same time settle in advance other questions which we shall be called upon to settle hereafter, and which Senators on this floor declare it is their wish to avoid.

I will not detain the Senate by any further remarks.

Mr. POMEROY. I am not opposed to the object of this joint resolution, but rather to the form in which it is presented. I do not suppose that States that are not represented in either House of Congress should have a representation in the Electoral College. There seems to be an impropriety and an inconsistency in admitting their votes and counting them; but this resolution as it is presented to us goes on to state certain things about some of these States which are so far from being true that they become almost offensive. In the preamble of this resolution, it is said, of Arkansas, for instance, among other States, "the inhabitants and local authorities have continued to be in armed rebellion for three years, and were so during the last election on the 8th day of November."

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me, those words to which he refers have been stricken out. The amendment reported by the committee, striking out all after the words "United States" in the preamble, and substituting other words in lieu of them, has been adopted.

Mr. POMEROY. Let me inquire if the words substituted in lieu of them make any reference to Arkansas?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Arkansas is left in in the first part of the preamble, to which, I presume, the Senator from Kansas has no objection. It now reads, whereas the inhabitants and local authorities of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Arkansas, and others, rebelled against the Government of the United States. The Senator does not deny that.

Mr. POMEROY. No, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The rest of the preamble is stricken out, and a substitute has been adopted, the very object of which was to avoid this statement upon which the Senator is commenting.

Mr. POMEROY. I am very glad to learn that. I was not in my seat at the time that amendment was adopted. So far from the local authorities of the State of Arkansas having been in armed rebellion for three years, the authorities who did rebel have not been inside the State for a year. The rebel governor and legislature were driven out long ago, and have not been back, and cannot come back; some of them are dead, and never will come back. I thought, with such a state of facts as that, the statement in the preamble to this resolution, that the State had continued in rebellion up to the 8th of last November, was very inconsistent.

But I want to say again that the State of Arkansas has not voted at all in the presidential election. There are no votes from that State. Under the instructions and impressions that the members from Arkansas received here last session, they distinctly understood that States not represented in either branch of Congress would have no right to vote at the presidential election. They returned to Arkansas and so reported, and they never had any election; there are no votes here from that State. They have been in suspense awaiting the action of Congress, and while that state of things lasted, of course they held no election. So far as this resolution is concerned, it does not affect that State one way or the other; there are no votes to count from that State.

Mr. COWAN. I have but a word or two to say on this question. I suppose as a general proposition all States have a right to be represented in this election of our President; but it appears that there is a difficulty in regard to some of the States named here. I am not sure that I know exactly the condition of this preamble. I understand that Arkansas is stricken out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir.

Mr. COWAN. Do they all remain as they are here?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. COWAN. And the question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to strike out the word "Louisiana?"

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. COWAN. The preamble states the fact of the rebellion prevailing in these States, and the resolution declares that because of this fact stated in the preamble these States ought not to vote. That is the proposition from the committee. The amendment of the honorable Senator from Vermont, on the other hand, proposes to take the question in blank, and to declare that all the States which were proclaimed to be in a state of insurrection by the President ought not to vote until that insurrection has been declared by law to be suppressed. I am opposed to that amendment for divers reasons, and I think if we come to examine this question fairly we shall see that any action of ours intended to prevent Louisiana, for instance, and Arkansas from voting will be perhaps a breach of faith on the part of this Government, and a violation of that courtesy which is due from one department of it to another.

Sir, what are the facts? It is said that by the act of July 13, 1861, these States are cut out from the Union and debarred from all their privileges as States, political as well as others. I do not so read the act of July 13, 1861; nor do I conceive that that was its purpose, because in endeavoring to get at a fair construction of a law, it is always necessary to ascertain what was the purpose of the lawgiver. I apprehend, so far from its being the purpose of that law to put these States out of the Union, it was its intention to keep them in; that is it was intended to be a means to keep them in, although for the purpose of better achieving that end all commercial intercourse was cut off with them, but not political intercourse. They were not deprived of any of their rights as States, or from exercising any of the functions of States, provided they were able to do so in due time.

In pursuance of that act of Congress, the President, by his proclamation of August 16, 1861, declared Louisiana in a state of insurrection. By the proclamation of January 1, 1863, he exempted thirteen parishes of the State from the operation of the emancipation proclamation. Why? Because he says in that proclamation that the rebellion does not exist in those thirteen parishes; that that condition of things upon which he was allowed before that time to issue his proclamation did not exist in those parishes, and therefore he exempted them. We recognized the validity of that proclamation I believe; at least we have always treated it with that respect which is due to the act of another department of this Government when it is not grossly in violation of law or of the Constitution. By the proclamation, however, of the 8th of December, 1863, the President invited the people of Louisiana and of all the other States to resume their State rights and State functions, provided one tenth of them would agree to make the proper organization.

Now, as I understand the question here, it is simply this: in pursuance of that invitation extended by the President, and upon the footing of his proclamation declaring that those rights should be restored to them, and that they would be protected in the exercise of them, the people of Louisiana, in numbers sufficient to bring them within his terms, have organized a State government, and have it now actually in operation in the State of Louisiana. The question simply is, whether we will carry out that arrangement of the President in good faith, or whether we will violate it; and that is the question which presents itself distinctly upon the propositions now before this body.

The President has invited a number of the people of these States which have been oppressed with the rebellion to go to work to reorganize their State governments, and has promised that he will extend, and this Government will extend, to them the protection guarantied by the Constitution; and he goes so far as to state that phrase of the Constitution in hæc verba. Will we stand by it? That is the question. Will we carry it out in good faith? If we are willing to do so, then there is no difficulty; and this one tenth of the people, or whatever the number may be, will become for this occasion the State of Louisiana, and the State of Arkansas, or any other State that sees fit to accept those conditions.

I may here remark, Mr. President, that no member of the Senate has yet undertaken to determine what number of people in a State shall be in rebellion in order to deprive the residue of the population of their rights. It is perfectly clear, I take it, the State being a corporation, that if the officers of the corporation refuse to do their duty, refuse to carry out the laws of the franchise, that that does not destroy the corporation. The corporation still remains, and a court would appoint trustees for the purpose of sustaining it, and for the purpose of carrying out the original intent with which it was created. If a portion of the people of a State, say ten thousand, were to drive away the State officers, or even if the State officers were to leave themselves, and for the time being suspend the functions of the State government, it is perfectly clear that that would not affect the rights of anybody else who had not been engaged in the original enterprise, however much they might have obeyed those who obtained the control of that government, and which exercised its authority over them. Then if ten thousand cannot do it, can twenty thousand, can thirty thousand, or can any number of people in a State, being rebellious and disloyal, deprive the loyal of the privileges granted to them under the Constitution?

Those are questions which have not been settled. Those are questions upon which I have not heard an opinion. Can the majority of the people of a State destroy that State? They may derange and disorder its functions as such, but the moment they are suppressed and put down, and the usurpation removed, I would like to know whether the rights do not all remit themselves to the loyal people and those who have not been engaged in the enterprise?

I am not prepared to say that these rights have all come back to these people in Louisiana. I am not prepared by any means to determine that question, simply because the President has better means of ascertaining and determining it; and I think the question remains with him. It was his business as the agent, the Executive in fact of the United States Government, to put down this rebellion, to relieve the people from its oppression, and to restore them precisely to where they were when the rebellion found them. If that is done, in ten days after his proclamation, eo instanti, the people resume their rights and functions; and in this case I understand they are not only in possession of the right, but are actually in the enjoyment of it, having a regularly-organized government with all the machinery necessary and proper to a government. Whether it is a government of so many people as will be enabled to maintain its supremacy over the whole State is a question, but it is a question which the Executive is to decide, because he is to sustain it there and make it able to be supreme within the limits of that State; and if I understand it that is just exactly why we are now giving him men and money, armies and navies. It is in order that he may bring about that desired result.

Mr. President, this involves a direct conflict between the legislative and executive bodies of this Government, and at this time I am of opinion that we cannot afford to enter into that conflict. We cannot afford to quarrel now, because the game would not pay for the candle. There is no practical value in the question that is raised here at any rate, because it will not alter the result of the presidential election a hair's breadth whether the electoral votes of Louisiana and Arkansas are counted or are not counted; and it is admitted to be a very grave question, and one upon which our people will be likely to divide. Then why should we raise it when it is not necessary? By not raising it we are left free to decide it when it shall be a material question before us really. By raising it now upon an issue in which it is not wholly involved or wholly eliminated, we may be precluded hereafter from deciding it as we would desire to decide in such a case.

Therefore I think, for my own part, that it would have been better not to moot the question now, seeing that it can have no practical result, that the only possible consequence which can follow it is to divide and distract the various departments of this Government. I am unwilling to do that. I am willing at the present time to submit to anything that is not materially fatal. I am unwilling to raise any question which does not cross our path distinctly and in front of us while this war is pending, because—I have my own notions about that—it is war, and I would devote the whole energies of the nation to the successful conduct of that war, such a conduct of it as will enable us when it is brought to a successful conclusion to meet and adjust these questions in freedom, and without having impending over us the prospect that all the questions may be futile even if they are decided.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania is about through, and with his permission I will occupy the floor for a few minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. COWAN. Very well.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire—

Mr. COWAN. Oh, I hope the Senator from Kentucky will be allowed to make a speech. I shall be exceedingly sorry to see him prevented from enjoying that rare privilege. [Laughter.]

Mr. POMEROY. I merely wish to make a single correction, if I may be allowed to do so. I want to say to the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, that the modification which has been made is not such as I understood him to say it was.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not yield the floor.

The VICEPRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania having yielded the floor to the Senator from Kentucky, the latter is entitled to it and will proceed.

Mr. DAVIS. It seems to me that a good many questions have been brought into this debate that are foreign to the point in issue. The presidential election has taken place; it remains now to count the vote. The question is how the vote is to be counted, and by whom the vote is to be counted. Preliminary to the count of the vote the Presiding Officer of the Senate has by the Constitution one office to perform, and what is it? Simply to open the votes. He is to perform no other function or act than to open the votes. When the votes are opened they are still to be counted, and who is to count them? The two Houses in convention are to count them. I have no doubt of that fact. And the question now under consideration is, have the two Houses of Congress in their legislative capacity the power to lay down certain rules by which this office of counting the vote may be performed? I think that they have. The clause in the Constitution read first by the Senator from New Hampshire and subsequently by other Senators, seems to me to confer full and plenary power in relation to the manner of counting the votes upon Congress; and Congress may declare by its legislative action certain rules to regulate the count of the presidential vote. This may be declared by an act of Congress or by a joint resolution passed previously for the purpose of convenience and to prevent disorder in the matter of counting the vote. The vote is to be counted in the presence of the two Houses, and would it not be competent for Congress to pass a law directing that as the certificates are opened by the Presiding Officer of the Senate they should be counted in the presence of the two Houses by the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives jointly?

Mr. COWAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him how the question can possibly be raised, until after we get into joint convention, whether the vote of a State shall be counted or not?

Mr. DAVIS. Just as any other question could be.

Mr. COWAN. I ask the Senator whether today Congress could pass a law that the vote of Pennsylvania should not be counted for any reason whatever?

Mr. DAVIS. It could if it pleased.

Mr. COWAN. Would the law be valid?

Mr. DAVIS. It is only the vote that is counted that rules the presidential election. Whatever vote is counted in that election decides the question of the election to the Presidency. Who is to perform that office of counting the vote? I maintain that it is to be done by the two Houses or in the presence of and under the supervision of the two Houses. The question now is whether the two Houses in their legislative capacity may lay down certain principles and regulations to prevent disorder and confusion in the act of counting the presidential votes? I think they may.

Where the Constitution directs an act to be done it invests all needful power to enable that act to be conveniently done. As I understand the Constitution, the power to count the votes is vested in the two Houses of Congress. That is a power to be executed under the Constitution. A general provision of the Constitution provides that Congress may pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution any power vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any of the departments or officers thereof. This power to count the presidential votes is certainly vested by the Constitution somewhere. It is vested in the two Houses. The manner in which the count shall be made is not prescribed by the Constitution. Then comes in the general power given to Congress to pass all laws necessary and proper to execute any of the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government or in any department or officer thereof.

I understand that that incidental power is simply proposed to be executed by this joint resolution in declaring certain principles and forms by which the count shall be made. This count is to be made in subordination to the Constitution. The Constitution declares that no man shall be eligible to the office of President unless he be a native-born citizen or a citizen of the United States at the adoption of the Constitution. Suppose the State of Louisiana had voted for a man who did not come up to that qualification, who was not a native citizen of the United States, or who had not resided in the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, would it not be the duty of the two Houses, in counting the vote, to decline to count the vote of Louisiana that had been cast for a person for President in direct conflict with the spirit and the letter of the Constitution? It certainly would. The vote must be counted. How can it be counted until it is ascertained? The vote must be identified. It must be identified and ascertained in obedience to certain principles of the Constitution. One of those principles is that the candidate voted for must be thirty-five years of age; another is that he must have been a citizen of the United States at the time the Constitution was adopted, or he must be a native-born citizen. Any vote cast in opposition to these plain and palpable provisions of the Constitution would be null and void; it would not be a vote for President in conformity to the Constitution, and therefore it would be void. To ascertain whether this vote is so cast or not, the two Houses of Congress, acting in the count of the vote, must decide whether any State has voted for a man under thirty-five years of age, or voted for an alien, against the provisions of the Constitution. They are to ascertain whether such votes have been given or not, before they can make a constitutional count of the votes.

Now, sir, as I understand the effect of this joint resolution, it is simply in a form to do that duty; that is, to ascertain whether the vote of certain States has been cast in conformity to the Constitution or not, and deciding that they have not been cast in conformity to the Constitution, to exclude them from the count. Some gentlemen here think the election in Louisiana was illegal for one class of reasons; I think it was illegal for another class of reasons; but as we both come to the same conclusion, it is immaterial upon what ground. The vote of that State is illegal. If I assume that it is illegal on one reason, and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] assumes that it is illegal upon another reason, I shall not dispute with him about the grounds that brought him to the conclusion to exclude the vote of Louisiana, but I will agree that he shall vote to exclude it upon his reason and I will vote to exclude it upon mine.

But, sir, the position I intended to state and upon which I rely, is simply this: that Congress, for the convenience of the two bodies when they are in convention, and to prevent disorder and confusion at the time and place of counting the presidential votes, may previously by joint resolution declare certain principles upon which that count shall take place; that the resolution now under consideration simply does that, and therefore it comes legitimately and properly within the exercise of an incidental power of Congress to pass such laws as shall be necessary and proper to enable any expressly granted power in the instrument to be executed; and it is simply for that purpose that this resolution was offered, and it ought to pass.

Mr. POWELL. I am opposed to the amendment of the honorable Senator from New Jersey to strike out "Louisiana" from the preamble, and I am also opposed to the substitute offered by the honorable Senator from Vermont to the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator from New Jersey yesterday, speaking of Louisiana, referred to a statement made by General Banks before the Judiciary Committee, in which he declared that the recent elections in that State were conducted without any interference from the military; and he read this clause in the statement of General Banks:

"I desire to state in the most unqualified terms, that no effort whatever was made on the part of the military authorities to influence the citizens of the State either in the selection of candidates or in the election of officers, and that the direct influence of the Government of the United States was less in Louisiana than in the election probably of any other State of the Union."

I do not concur with General Banks in that statement, and the paper in which it is contained entirely overthrows the position taken by General Banks about the non-interference of the military authorities with the election in the State of Louisiana. General Banks in this paper tells you that the military authorities prescribed the qualifications of voters in that State; that they allowed persons to vote who were disqualified from voting by the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana. Under the constitution and laws of Louisiana persons in the Army and Navy are not legal voters. General Banks tells you that he modified that provision and allowed those persons to vote. He tells you further that the voters were required to take and did take every one of them the oath prescribed in the President's amnesty proclamation of December 8, 1863; and that the military authorities not only prescribed the qualifications of voters and the oath they should take, but fixed the rule for the eligibility of candidates to office.

The amnesty proclamation of the President of December 8, 1863, it will be borne in mind requires each person to swear, not only that he will support all the laws of Congress passed on the subject of slavery, but all the proclamations issued by the President on that subject or that he may hereafter issue. That was a condition precedent to anybody being qualified as a voter at these elections in Louisiana. Although these facts all appear in this very statement of General Banks he comes here and tells you in another part of the statement that the interference of the Government in the elections in Louisiana was probably less than in any State of the Union! Did General Banks think for a moment that the members of this body were so grossly ignorant of public affairs as not to know that his statement was incorrect?

I ask you, sir, what greater interference there could be by the governmental authorities with the elections of a State than to prescribe qualifications of voters different from those prescribed in the constitution and laws of the State? Will General Banks tell me that in any State of the Union (except in some parts of Kentucky, where the military authorities did pretend to prescribe the qualification of voters), the authorities of this Government have the power to prescribe those qualifications? Has it been done in any of the adhering States save in some localities in the border States? Has the Government of the United States, by any or all of its departments, presumed to prescribe the qualifications of a voter in the State of New Jersey, or the State of New York, or the State of Ohio? No, sir. And yet General Banks tells you in this paper, which is relied upon by the Senator from New Jersey, that there was no governmental interference with the elections in Louisiana, or, at least, less probably than in any State of the Union. General Banks is greatly mistaken when he asserts that, and the very paper that he submits clearly and palpably stamps the statement as erroneous.

I am opposed to admitting on this floor persons who are elected under the bayonet influence in any way whatever. I very well know that there was no free expression of the people of Louisiana in these elections. I know that they but obeyed the behests of the military, whatever commanders may say about it. General Banks tells you in this very statement that the military authorities there undertook to alter the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana, and by military proclamations and orders to prescribe the qualifications of voters. Does any man tell me that an election held under such circumstances is a free election? No, sir. My friend from Ohio [Mr. WADE] says it is a farce, and but for its tragical results upon republican liberty it would be the greatest of farces. Its effect upon the liberty of the people, and upon every principle of self-government and every principle of republican government, is most tragic and disastrous. While I hold a seat here or have a voice anywhere, never with my consent shall any man take position in the councils of thenation who was elected by force of military power. The military must stand aloof from elections. Let them fight the armed enemies of the country, and let the people in their civil capacity go forward, and, uninfluenced by anything else than their own good judgments, vote as they please. Let the constituted authorities of the States prescribe, as they have a right to do, the qualifications of their voters and of their candidates for office. Whenever you depart from that principle, you stab in the most vital part our system of government, you overthrow the representative republican system, and you establish on its ruins a military despotism. I will not consent to it in any form or in any manner. So much for the elections in Louisiana.

I am opposed to the substitute offered by the distinguished Senator from Vermont to the resolution before the Senate. There is in his amendment a power given to the President of the United States which would enable him, if he had almost any strength, to reelect himself. That amendment declares that the vote of any State which may have been declared to be in rebellion by the proclamation of the President made in pursuance of the act of July 13, 1861, shall not be counted. Now suppose—I will merely suppose the case for illustration—that at the next presidential election Mr. Lincoln should be again a candidate; and suppose on a general survey of the political field he should find that it was necessary that the votes of New York and Ohio, for instance, should be excluded in order to secure his reelection; and then suppose that in order to prevent their votes from being counted, which if counted would certainly defeat his election, he should manage to have a little row kicked up there, and then declare Ohio and New York in a state of rebellion: what would be the result? According to the amendment, their votes could not be counted, and that would insure his reelection. It is a power which I will never by any vote of mine clothe the Executive with.

For the reasons which I have thus briefly stated, I cannot support either the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey, or that offered by the Senator from Vermont, but prefer to adhere to the resolution as it came from the Committee on the Judiciary.

I believe that the States in revolt are still States of the Union. I believe they are not out of the Union. I believe, furthermore, that when they choose to lay down their arms, and to elect officers of their State governments who acknowledge this Government, and to send members to the House of Representatives, and Senators to this Chamber, they have the right to do so, and I believe that they ought to be permitted to do so. While I say that, I know of course that each House is the judge of the qualifications of its members, and each House is to judge for itself whether the resistance to the Government in any State has sufficiently ceased to entitle it to representation here, and hence it is that each case must stand upon its own merits as it is presented here. For myself, I would vote to-morrow to receive Senators in this Hall from every State that is in revolt, provided I believed that a majority of the people of those States, unawed by the military power, uninfluenced by any outward force, of their own good will, in the exercise of their own volition, had in good faith elected those men in the way prescribed by their constitution and laws. I think, whenever they manifest such disposition to return, a majority of the people will indicate that it is our duty to allow them to return. We, of course, and the other House, must be the judges of that matter to a great extent; we must sit in judgment upon each case; and we must decide whether or not a majority of the people of the State have ceased their resistance to the authority of the United States, and whether or not the parties who present themselves were elected by the free suffrages of those people, unawed by the military or any other power.

Mr. COWAN. Allow me to ask the honorable Senator what he would do if a majority of the people of a State were to establish a monarchy?

Mr. POWELL. The Constitution guarantees a republican form of government.

Mr. COWAN. The remedy is to be found in the Constitution, to make war upon it and overturn it. But suppose they persist in it continuously, would the Senator hold them by conquest, or would he help the minority to preserve a republican form of government and control the monarchical majority?

Mr. POWELL. I think it is the duty of the United States, under the Constitution, to see that every State has a republican form of government, and I would always do my duty as I understood it. But, sir, the question which the Senator puts is not one that has anything to do with the subject which I am discussing. I am speaking of facts as they are. I say, believing that these States are States in the Union, that they are not out of the Union, whenever a majority of the people in either one of these States shall of their own free will cease to resist the authorities and Government of the United States, and shall elect of their own free will Senators and Representatives to Congress, I will only inquire as to the fact whether they have ceased their resistance and whether a majority of the people have determined to be loyal to the Constitution and Government of the United States; and that fact being established so as to leave no doubt upon my mind, I would then be ready to admit their Representatives as our equals here. That is my notion of the matter, and I believe the proposition presented from the Judiciary Committee is about the best we can pass under the circumstances. It does not preclude us hereafter from deciding upon any of the questions which have been incidentally alluded to in debate. I supported the resolution in committee and I shall vote for it here.

Mr. COWAN. The inquiry which I put to the Senator from Kentucky I think is one which reaches to the very marrow of this question. The people of a State are divided; about half of them desire to preserve their connection with the Union, to give it their allegiance; but the other portion, say a majority, refuse, and insist upon secession. We are bound by the Constitution to preserve the Union and to preserve the rights of the people under the Union; not merely the rights of a majority, but the rights of the people, of all the people, and of any number of the people however small. What are we to do? A minority of the people come forward and say, "If you aid us for a while we can preserve this State and keep her in the Union." "But no," according to the doctrine advanced here, "there must be a majority of you before we can recognize you as in the Union." Suppose they answer you, "The majority, by persisting in abandoning the Union, can destroy forever the State and deprive us of our rights which were guaranteed to us as a portion of the people of the State."

A portion of the people of Louisiana come here and say, "We are loyal, we owe you allegiance, we have a State government organized and in operation, and if you will aid and assist us we will keep it in organization and operation, and we will control and dominate after a time the rebels and secessionists." What is it proposed to answer to them? "You cannot come back; there are not enough of you." That will be very poor encouragement for the loyal men of the rebel States to try and bring back their people to reason, and it presumes another thing that never was true, that the people, the masses of a country under circumstances like those which surround us, ever were in rebellion. The masses of the people even in the southern States never were in rebellion against the Government of the United States. They never could have been. The masses never go into rebellion unless they have wrongs to redress and injuries to avenge. That was not the case in this rebellion. It is a rebellion of leaders, and the masses are deluded away by falsehoods industriously circulated everywhere, and inflammatory speeches made. It is impossible for them to get back unless we create some such scaffolding in the rebel States as these governments of Arkansas and Louisiana will furnish. We ought to cultivate them. We ought not, I think, to stop and inquire whether they constitute a tenth or a twentieth of the inhabitants; we ought to make the most of them. They are all we have there; and if we repulse them and take away their authority, what is left in those States, what have we there? Will not those loyal men say, "What is the bounty to loyalty that you propose? Why, that we wait without any State government, that we submit to this military rule and dictation, which is so much deprecated, until we can convert more than a majority of the people to establish a State government."

Mr. President, I have one more word to say, and I was about to say it when I yielded the floor to the venerable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. Davis.] This question, I take it, is here prematurely. It ought not to be here at this present time. It is not legitimately raised now. It can only be raised, I take it, in the joint convention which will meet on next Wednesday for the purpose of counting these votes. The Constitution provides that the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted, not by the Vice President, for that does not follow, but shall be counted by that body there assembled in joint convention. Are we to undertake to decide beforehand what shall be done, without knowing what votes are to be presented there? We cannot tell what votes you have now in your drawer, Mr. President, to be presented to that convention. We cannot tell whether the Governors have returned them. We cannot tell whether you have received them by mail or received them by the hands of the Governors, or whether you have received them from the district judges, who are to hold them as a last resort, so that you may get them. We cannot tell anything about that. Then why raise the question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to trespass on the good nature of my friend from Pennsylvania to ask him a question. As I saw an experiment of this kind once tried, I should like to ask him if this power of ours can only be exercised after we have formed a joint convention, what rules would regulate the conduct of that joint convention? I will tell him a little circumstance which occurred eight years ago, when a somewhat distinguished individual of his own State was elected President of the United States. I was then a member of the House of Representatives. The Senate came into the Hall of the House with great form and ceremony, two and two, Mr. Mason, of Virginia, the arch-traitor, at their head. He took his seat as President of the Senate by the side of Mr. Speaker Banks. A question arose as to the vote of the State of Wisconsin. On account of a heavy snow storm, the electors of that State could not meet on the day fixed by law, and consequently the vote was not cast on the day prescribed by law. When that fact appeared on reaching the vote of that State, a row, as we called it in the House, commenced. Mr. Humphrey Marshall wanted to make a speech and addressed "Mr. President." Mr. Mason refused to recognize him, but Mr. Banks recognized him; they were both sitting side by side. Then some Senators wanted to say something, and in five minutes we were in such complete confusion that Mr. Mason left his place at the Speaker's desk, went out, some of the Senators following him and some remaining behind amid the general jeers of the whole convention. That was the condition of affairs then, and it will be the condition of affairs perhaps next week if we leave this question open. As I happened to be present at that scene and saw it, I want to guard against its recurrence.

Can the Senator tell me by what rules the joint convention is to be governed; how they shall vote, whether per capita or by States; who shall preside; who shall put questions; whether the rules of the Senate as to debate shall prevail or the rules of the House of Representatives; because if the rules of the Senate prevail in the joint convention, we never could get through until a second President was elected? Surely that would be so in a convention of two hundred men, when we find it very difficult here in a body of forty or fifty to get to the end of any controverted matter. The votes would not be counted that day if the rules of the Senate prevailed as to debate, and the law prescribes that they shall be counted on that day. Who would put an end to the discussion? The question came up in the instance I put, when Mr. Humphrey Marshall proposed to speak and the President of the Senate would not recognize him, and would not recognize a Senator, and the Speaker of the House did recognize Mr. Humphrey Marshall; and the consequence was we got into disorder and confusion, and the joint convention broke up. It was one of the most ridiculous spectacles I have ever seen in a legislative body, and I hope never to see another such.

Mr. COWAN. I am only to take the Constitution as I find it written; and it is no argument to me that a general law has not been made by which to regulate the proceedings of this joint convention, if such a one is necessary. Perhaps the legislative department in this case has not deemed it necessary that there should be a general law to regulate the action of that convention when it was in session. Yet they are perfectly competent to make it. Perhaps they could not foresee that it would behave in such an extraordinary and ridiculous manner as has just been represented by the Senator from Ohio. What I mean to say is, that whether it has any law made beforehand to govern its action or not, it is unquestionably clothed with the power of receiving there and counting the votes.

I have no objection to the passage of a law by Congress that the Vice President of the United States shall preside in that convention, or that the Speaker of the House shall preside in it, and that the rules of the Senate, or the rules of the House of Representatives shall be adopted for its governance. If the disorder spoken of did occur, why did it occur? It did not occur because it was improper to clothe that body with that power, but it occurred because it was casus omissus, no provision had been made for the governance of the body in joint convention; but that it has the power and that it is the only tribunal which can count these votes and can settle the question as to what votes shall be counted, I take to be indisputable from this provision of the Constitution. If there is the mischief attendant upon it that has just been described, as I have stated before that mischief should be cured by law. It is not to be cured by our usurping the functions of that convention while we are separate and distinct bodies. It is not for us to provide by a law for this particular case, and to decide before we go there what votes shall be counted or shall not be counted, because if the convention cannot decide that question what is it there for?

Some honorable Senators have said that the members of the two Houses are there present only as witnesses, idle spectators of a scene in which they can take no part, and over which they have no authority. If that be the case, then there is one instance in this Constitution, magnificent monument of human wisdom as it is, which is utter, sheer absurdity. Are the two Houses there, as the jockeys say, merely for the purpose of "seeing fair," or are they there in some capacity in which they have power and authority to determine such questions as may arise while the counting is going on? I take it they have the authority, and that if they did not adopt rules for their governance, if they did not appoint a President, if they only went there loosely as a mob, a herd of men without organization, they could not expect to adjourn in anything less than the row which resulted upon that occasion.

I have only to repeat that I think this question is premature, that it is here improperly, and that nothing but mischief will come of it if we entertain it in this shape; that no matter what we do with it, it will have no practical bearing upon the great end for which the whole of this machinery was created, that is, the election of a President and a Vice President. That election will not be influenced a hair's breadth one way or the other by our determination, no matter what we may do, and as to the mischief of this thing, the mischief is just as much on one side as the other. If the President may fabricate fictitious States in order to give him votes, so if we have the authority to declare who shall and who shall not vote, we may destroy actual and loyal States in order to carry out our party purposes. I hope neither of these propositions will pass.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, about a year ago Congress, anticipating that such questions as this might arise, in my judgment very wisely framed a law and passed it through both branches with the hope of settling this matter in advance. That law was made upon great deliberation in both bodies of Congress; it received a very large vote in each House. It was very proper in my judgment that Congress should fix the matter then, because everybody could anticipate that a question of the most serious danger to the Republic might arise in the then approaching presidential election which might endanger the stability of our Union, and which might under certain circumstances precipitate these northern States into a civil war. Apprehending that such a question might arise, Congress wisely, in my judgment, provided against it, but the President did not agree with them, and he vetoed their bill, leaving the question open with all its dangers, which, thank God, have not arisen.

What would be our condition now, if in the presidential election which has just passed the vote had been so balanced that in order to carry the election for one or the other of the candidates it was necessary to resort to some of the States that are now sought to be recognized as part and parcel of the present Government? Could we ever have settled the question? I fear that we could not, and I was the more apprehensive of it because I was present on the occasion to which my colleague has alluded. I saw even there, when we were in joint convention and there was an irregularity as to the vote of a single State, a mere technicality and nothing more, it created a sensation in that body which threatened the stability of the Government. There was not a right-minded man present there who did not fear that even then that technicality, which would not affect the result whichever way it was decided, might lead to the setting up of pretensions which were dangerous to the stability of the Government.

Now, sir, it is time that we should settle the question by some legislation that will reach the whole subject. In my judgment the proposition of the Senator from Vermont is the wisest, the most far-reaching, and the best adapted to settle the controversy for the present occasion and for all time to come. I do not like to have such questions unsettled so long. I suppose the bill to which I have referred was vetoed by the President because—

Mr. JOHNSON, and others. It was not vetoed.

Mr. WADE. I speak of it as having been vetoed, because I do not care much about the form of the thing. It amounted to a veto. He put the bill in his pocket.

Mr. JOHNSON. If he had vetoed it, it might have been passed over his head.

Mr. WADE. We might or might not have passed it over the veto. The President prevented our making it a law, and he did so constitutionally. He did not transcend, in that respect, the powers which the Constitution vested in him. We passed the bill less than ten days before the session expired, and therefore he had a perfect right to withhold his assent from it, and give us no reasons for so doing. He chose to do that, and, as I suppose, he did it in defense of the proclamation which he had put forth, declaring that whenever a tenth part of the people of a State would come back, he would recognize them as the State and as part and parcel of this Government—a proposition which, with all my respect for the Chief Magistrate, I am bound to say is the most absurd and impracticable that ever haunted the imagination of a statesman. A man imbued with republican principles must know that the foundation of all free government depends upon the elective franchise. The ingenuity of man has failed to devise any other way whereby people can govern themselves except submission for the time being to the will of the majority constitutionally and legally expressed. If you cut loose from that principle you have nothing else to regulate your conduct. So far as human sagacity in the way of government has yet gone, I say if you cut loose from that great principle there is nothing left, and all before you is open sea, all anarchy, all confusion; and I must say of that proclamation of the President that it was the most contentious, the most anarchical, the most dangerous proposition that was ever put forth for the government of a free people.

What, sir, one tenth part of the people of a State govern the rest? The thing is impossible, impracticable; it cannot be done. Take away your military power from those States, withdraw your Army, and leave the one tenth to govern the remaining nine tenths in the State, and where would they be? The result would be to sacrifice every Union man in the southern States. When the General Government abandons them, when it leaves the one tenth in the hands and under the dominion of the nine tenths, what will be their condition? I had a conversation with the now Vice President-elect of the United States on that subject, and with other gentlemen on the Union side in the southern States, and I do not know of one of them who was not filled with the deepest apprehension that if this principle should prevail they would be annihilated by the nine tenths.

Can any portion of the territory of a State attempt to govern the whole? Suppose you have got one loyal county in a State, can it control the destinies of all the rest of that State? If you have by military authority within the lines of your encampment a great city or a portion of a State where there is a population, is it very difficult for the President or for the commanding officers there to get up all the paraphernalia of a State upon a ten-acre piece of land? When you have done that, and under the shadows of your armies attempt to elect all the magistrates and all the officers necessary to perfect the machinery of your government and put it in operation, can you be so blind as to suppose that when you have by military power, for it is nothing else, clothed these men with authority to govern, it is a republican government? Sir, it is just as much a military government as it was before you went through the farce of selecting those officers. There is your military governor; has he ever been withdrawn from Louisiana; or if another governor has been substituted, by whom was he substituted? By the Commander-in-Chief of all the armies of the United States. When the mandate went forth from the President to Mr. Hahn, "Be Governor of that State," he did not consult the Senate, he did not consult anybody in particular; but the mandate issued from the President of the United States unaided, unknown, uncounseled by anybody, "Mr. Hahn, be Governor of that State, call a convention, declare what your status shall be in the Republic, elect your Representatives, organize in form the shadow of a State government, and you shall be a State government." They could make out the semblance, but it lacks all the reality of a government, because it does not represent the will of the people, or at least we have no evidence that it is the will of the people of the State.

There is no alternative. If you have a rebellious people who are determined that they will not submit to the laws and authority of the General Government, if a majority of a State are thus inclined, a free government in that State is impossible. You need not talk to me about your one tenth. The Senator from Pennsylvania wants to know if it takes a majority to govern a State. I wish he was here, because I want to put the question to him, how do you understand it; "how readest thou?" is there any principle of free government that has decided that anything less than a majority of the people of a State, or of the voters of a State, can govern its destinies? I mean upon republican democratic principles. I speak not of the farce of a civil government overshadowed by a military governor, a wheel within a wheel, a military government dominating your whole political community, and inside of that and under it and subordinate to it, a civil government pretending to be a free government! I say it is a farce; it is unworthy of the American Senate to give it a moment's consideration.

Let us look the fact right straight in the face. You can have no peace, you can have no free government, you can have nothing but the shadow and semblance of one, until the majority of the people of a State are loyal. Why make this false pretense? It is a government upon false pretenses. Withdraw your Army from Louisiana to-day, and what would be its condition? Have you any evidence as to what that people would do to-morrow if you withdrew all your military force from there? Have they voted, have they given any evidence to show that they are loyal to the Government of the United States? Not a lisp of it, not a word of it. More than four fifths of the territory of that State now is trampled down beneath the feet of military power, just where it ought to be for its rebellion, and you dare not withdraw your armies from there; and yet you talk of free republican State government there! Sir, you cannot have it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to ask him a question on that point. He seems to think the presence of an army is opposed to all free government. Where would the Senate and House of Representatives be if you withdrew the army of the Potomac? Where would they have been any time these last three years? Is there no army here?

Mr. WADE. We have not, thank God, been captured yet. This capital has not been overrun yet by the enemy. If it had been, and Mr. Davis's army were predominating in this capital, I think our legislation would be a mere sham. Does the gentleman suppose that our legislation would be endured, provided the armies of Mr. Davis predominated in the capital? That would be like Louisiana now beneath the feet of the Federal Government. They cannot act freely. That is what I contend for. Neither could we if we were in like condition, and if we pretended to be a free people it would be the merest mockery and farce. These armies somehow must be got rid of before legislation can take place. Where armies are the law is silent.

But I do not wish to argue this question; I have argued it; the Senate and House of Representatives have argued it, and we have sent forth our will on this subject. I am astonished to find now any considerable difference of opinion in a body that so unanimously passed the bill to which I have referred, less than a year ago. Has anything occurred since to change our opinions? It is true that there has been an effort in Louisiana to get up a delegation, and they have come here. How much of the State do they claim to represent? How much of it was able to hold a free election? Can you really claim that that portion of it was free even where your army was? The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] has already told you that you did not govern according to the laws of that State; you did not even found the basis of your government upon the laws of the State, but your military authorities regulated the elective franchise there. Is there any freedom in that? No, sir.

I make these observations because I am exceedingly jealous of military power, and I never will consent that a people predominated over by a hostile military power shall found an American republican State. They cannot do it. To do it, they must be free as the air, and until they are in that condition it is impossible to have a free Government there; and until some evidence shall be presented to us that such is the condition of a majority, you may talk about your State government until doomsday; but every man imbued with American principles of democracy knows it is a falsehood, a mere semblance, and not a fact.

We are asked if the loyal men in a State ought not to govern it, whatever their numbers may be. I know it is very unfortunate for a man to locate himself in a community of law-breakers, whether they commit one kind of crime or another. If a great majority of them are traitors to the best Government on God's earth it is his misfortune that he has fallen into such a den of thieves. Statesmen proceeding upon general law and regulating great communities cannot take into consideration the fact of the individual hardship of this man or the other. He is surrounded by a great number of men who outvoted him, who declare that the Government under which he has lived is all wrong. They have declared war against the old Government. He may not concur with them, but if they outvote him and outfight him, and establish another Government, what remedy have you but that of force? You cannot select him out and protect him. If he cannot live there, he must make his way as best he can out of the community, and you cannot make laws to reach his individual case when there is a majority of his neighbors against him. How can you prosecute a man for treason there?

How can a man who is injured in that State because he is a loyal man, a man who is trespassed upon, whose person is violated by those who are in flagrant war with the United States, obtain redress? Are their courts open to him for the redress of his wrongs? Can he have redress? You know he cannot. What a farce, then, to contend that because there are a few Union men scattered through these communities a statesman can undertake to protect each one in his individual rights! The thing is impossible; the statesman that conceives it is blind.

If a majority of the people where I live and from which I come—provided the supposition can be entertained for a moment—or a controlling number of them, should turn violent traitors to the Government under which we live, what rights should I have, claiming to be a Union man? I might endeavor to maintain the laws of my country; but in that case they would have declared that to be a crime punishable by imprisonment or death, and I, standing by the old Constitution, should be amenable to this vile law of theirs. Could you rescue me? Could you say that there was a good Government there? Could I appeal to the courts administered by traitors and get my rights there as a Union man? The thing is impossible. Why do you struggle to maintain impossibilities?

Sir, these States must remain under military dominion, but I hope with all the equities that can be extended to a people thus unfortunate, until such time as they manifest to the people of the United States that they are able to govern themselves properly and subject to the laws of the General Government. There is no middle course. The bill which we passed last year provided for that. We knew that nothing less than a majority at least of the loyal men could maintain a loyal State government, because we knew of no rule except that of proceeding by majorities, and therefore we provided in the bill that whenever the provisional governor believed there was such a majority, it should be his duty to appoint commissioners to take a census of the State and ascertain the number of the people; and if there was a majority who were willing and anxious to submit to the General Government, a convention should be called and should be invested with immediate power to frame a government upon democratic principles, in their own way. That is the just and equitable bill which the President vetoed in order to vindicate his anarchical principle of ten per cent. of loyalty.

This resolution, if amended as proposed by the Senator from Vermont, meets my approbation more fully than any proposition which has been offered, and therefore I shall vote for it. Gentlemen have spoken of South Carolina, and said they cannot recognize her now, and they would not count her votes. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania said he would not count the votes of South Carolina if she sent them here. Why not? What is the difference between this case and that of South Carolina? Can anybody tell me? There is territory enough under the flag of the United States in South Carolina to get up a State Legislature just as good as that of Louisiana. We have nearly as much of South Carolina under the dominion of our flag as there is of Louisiana. Why then reject the one and admit the other? They both stand upon like principles. If you only measure by acres what dominion we have, what difference is there?

In my judgment, the only sensible plan is to leave these communities until in some way we can have at least reasonable evidence to show that a majority of them are loyal, and in a condition to maintain a free republican government of their own. Then I shall be the first man to reinvest them with the power. Let them have it so. Nobody regrets more than I do that any State of this Union has placed herself in a condition where we cannot trust her with the power to govern herself. I wish to God we could. Whenever it can be done I shall be the very first man to claim, as I have always claimed, that the people shall govern themselves wherever they can do it; nor will I yield to military despotism or to outside domination and pressure, getting up the semblance of a Legislature and calling it a fact. It is not a fact, and your legislative action cannot make it so. I thank God that in the last presidential election we were strong enough to carry our principles through, so as not to involve us in this question which might have launched us in civil war at the North. Let us keep clear of all such questions. Let us settle now and forever the principle that the President of the United States cannot in times of civil war, wherever he happens to have an army in a State, improvise by military force a Legislature, and call it the power of a State in such sort as to count that semblance in his favor as a fact. If it were attempted I know for one that I would not put up with it. I ask any Union man on this floor, suppose the States which now claim to be represented here had chosen electors in favor of General McClellan, and given him their votes, and those votes would have elected him President, would we submit to it? I do not believe there is a man on this floor who would. There is not one here who would not spill the last drop of his blood before yielding to such a thing. We would have said at once, "These communities were improvised; these powers were conferred on them by the military power of the United States; they do not represent the people, and therefore they shall not be represented on this floor or in the Electoral College."

Mr. JOHNSON. It would be the same thing, I suppose, if those votes would have elected Mr. Lincoln. There would be the same opposition.

Mr. WADE. Just the same; and I intend to say that although I was strongly against Mr. McClellan and in favor of Abraham Lincoln, yet if it had taken these semblances, these counterfeits, to make out his title to the Presidency, before God I would not have consented to receive them. If the man whom I opposed had received the votes of the nation, he should have had the position, and that would be the feeling of every Senator here I have no doubt. There is not a man here now who will rise in his place and say that if these votes could have been so changed as to elect our opponent we would have yielded to such state of things. Would any one have done it? I want to hear the Senator who will rise and tell me that he would have permitted these counterfeits, these disloyal States, these States which have declared war upon the General Government, to select a President for us. I say they have declared war against the General Government and they have never revoked that declaration of war, for I believe there is no one of these States which has yet revoked its act of secession and declaration of war. It is important to know how that fact is. Have the people that claim to be represented in this body as a State, by any vote repealed their act of secession and war? Are gentlemen here contending that men in flagrant war against the United States shall send a delegation here to represent them? Is that so? If nobody can answer my question I will apply to the case a well-known principle of law. The last we heard from them was that they had declared themselves out of the Union, and in flagrant war with the Union, and if nobody can show the contrary, that state of things exists to-day, for whoever contends that a state of things once proved to exist has been changed must submit to the fact that it exists now, unless he produces proof to the contrary.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state, with the Senator's leave, that my understanding is that Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee, all three, by their conventions, have passed an ordinance repealing the ordinance of secession. By stating that fact I am not attempting to confute the argument of the Senator, but I merely state the facts as a fact.

My recollection is that all three of them have done so.

Mr. WADE. I do not know whether it is so or not, but it is a mere sham if they have done so. They might as well have done that as any other part of this business, because all that was done was done by such voters as your military power prescribed, and they would have voted precisely as they were wanted to vote, whether to repeal the ordinance of secession, or to elect members to come here and claim seats. It is all of a piece. The great argument against it all is that these men do not represent the people of the State. The Senators who claim seats here from Louisiana cannot assert that they are here by the assent of a majority of that people fairly expressed. They represent nothing but the military power of the United States, and God knows that if I can prevent it they shall not sit here upon equal terms with me, who claim to be here by the voice of a majority of the State to which I belong. I will have no such company if I can help it, nor shall they ever be recognized by me. Sir, this great question should be settled now and forever before we meet in joint convention.

Mr. DOOLITTLE and Mr. WRIGHT sought the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will award the floor to the Senator from New Jersey, both he and the Senator from Wisconsin rising at the same time, and the Senator from Wisconsin having already spoken upon the question.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to withdraw his motion for a moment to allow me to say one word.

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust that we shall not now adjourn. This question ought to be settled. Let us sit here and dispose of it. If gentlemen wish to make remarks let us go on until we can get a vote. I think we had better hold on. I hope the Senator will not persist in his motion.

Mr. WRIGHT. I renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Dixon, Doolittle, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sumner, and Wright—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Farwell, Foster, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Powell, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Foot, Hale, Harding, Hicks, McDougall, Richardson, Riddle, and Saulsbury—10.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. COWAN. The honorable Senator from Ohio is mistaken when he supposes that I said I would not count the vote of South Carolina in the coming convention.

Mr. WADE. Some gentlemen on that side of the question said so; I thought it was the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COWAN. It is not very material; I merely wished the correction to be made. I have only to say that if South Carolina was in the condition of Louisiana and Arkansas, if her capital, as I hope it will be shortly, was in the possession of our armies, if there was no rebel government within her borders, if there was one tenth of her people willing, anxious, to establish, organize, get up, and sustain a State government, I would receive her vote; I would acquiesce under the proclamation of the President, although perhaps if I had been making that proclamation in the first place I would not have couched it in his phrase, I would not have subjected it to his terms; but as he has done it, as he has invited these people to enter upon the work on that basis, I am willing in good faith to carry out the stipulations that he has made with them. I would recognize them, and I would do as I believe he would do if he were a member of this body—he would submit to that vote. I do not see why he should not do so, and I have no doubt he would.

That is all that I desire to say except this: that these governments having been formed, a nucleus around which the loyal men are to gather, and clothed with the authority which is so potent among men, and which is so well calculated to bring them to any coöperation, I think they ought to be encouraged, and encouraged by all means.

Mr. WADE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. COWAN. Certainly.

Mr. WADE. The Senator says he would permit one tenth of the people to govern the State. Now I want to know of the Senator what pro-

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 36.

tection that one tenth will have when you withdraw all external power from them, and leave them to themselves? What chance will they have with the nine tenths opposed to them?

Mr. COWAN. That is the very question that we must now meet. It is the question now whether we will maintain State governments there in connection with the Union or whether we will treat these people as a conquered people, as conquered provinces; whether we will assume the task of governing them entirely or whether we will do that which the President is endeavoring to do now. I am very free to say that I am in favor of his plan; I very much prefer it; and I have no doubt that the one tenth of the people of a State organized with the reins of State government in their hands, the means of enforcing its authority, aided by the General Government, will finally bring back all these States to obedience, allegiance. I have no doubt about it. But repulse this one tenth, repulse the loyal people of the States who are endeavoring to bring them back, drive them away into rebellion, what then? If you have not the one tenth, you have nothing. If you have not these people who are your friends in Louisiana and Arkansas and the other States, whom have you? Are you determined to drive them all into utter and inextinguishable rebellion, or are you willing that the repentant, as well as those who have always been loyal, shall come back and endeavor to establish themselves in such form that the Union may be restored? To state the question, in my judgment, is to answer it.

It is said that the tenth of the people do not represent the whole people. They may not represent the whole people, loyal and disloyal, but they represent the loyal people, and it is the loyal people of these States for whom we have made this tremendous struggle. Is there a Senator on this floor who would have embarked on this war if it were not to rescue the loyal people of these States from the usurpation which oppressed them? Certainly not. What right should we have had to do so? If the whole of this people had gone away into secession, what right should we have had to restrain and control them?

We began with the belief that this was a conspiracy on the part of a few to lead away the masses, and that the masses, so far as they had an opportunity of expressing their preferences and giving their opinions by their votes, were loyal, and it was a contrivance and conspiracy that led them away into rebellion; and now, when that is broken up, when they are willing to come back, I am willing to receive them as they come, and I am not disposed to cavil upon the ninth part of a hairs as to whether they constitute a majority or not. It is enough for me to know that they are loyal people, and that they desire the restoration of the Union; they desire to be reunited to the great body-politic as members, part and parcel of it, and if they represent the loyal people, it is enough.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am afraid we shall not get through with this matter to-night, and there are two bills which I am anxious to have taken up and acted on, and I therefore ask the indulgence of the Senate to allow the bill fixing the duty on printing paper and the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill to be now taken up and made the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. WILSON. Let us vote on this question.

Mr. SHERMAN. My impression is that this is going to lead to a general debate, and I do not think it ought to stand in the way of ordinary legislative business. I am willing to have it go over and occupy the morning hour to-morrow, but I want an arrangement made by which the bills that I have referred to may be considered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I cannot consent to the proposition of the Senator from Ohio that this resolution shall go over and occupy the morning hour to-morrow. Every person who has spoken on the subject regards it as necessary that we should do something to settle this question. I will state to the Senate that a committee has been appointed to devise the mode of canvassing the votes for President and Vice President on Wednesday next, the time fixed by law for that canvass. That committee cannot act very well while this proposition is pending; and if they do act they will have to report some way to canvass the votes, and then this difficulty will be upon us again. We ought to settle it, and we ought to settle it now. It is important that we should settle it at once. We have but a few days to make the necessary reports and get them adopted, to canvass the vote in the usual way; and if we cannot sit the resolution out to-night, which I should prefer, I shall insist, so far as I am concerned—of course the Senate will control it—that we go on with it to-morrow to the exclusion of all other business until we dispose of it. I think no other business should interfere with this question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly have not taken any time in the discussion of this matter. I had hoped it might be voted on to-day, but it has occupied two days, and from our recent experience on a resolution on the passage of which not even the yeas and nays were called for, but which was debated here for ten days, my impression is that this resolution will be pending on next Wednesday, when we are ready to form in procession to march to the House of Representatives to count this vote.

Mr. JOHNSON. Hardly.

Mr. SHERMAN. It looks very much like it; and therefore I think we had better proceed with other business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him for the purpose of making it a special order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill cannot now be taken up.

Mr. SHERMAN. Can I make a motion at this time to postpone all other orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of that bill? If I can, I make that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves to postpone the further consideration of the pending bill for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the joint resolution relating to the duty on paper, and that is the question now before the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senate will not agree to that motion.

Mr. CONNESS. I feel a great interest in the settlement of the question now proposed to be called up by the honorable Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, but it appears to me that his own suggestion in regard to this measure is the greatest reason why we should continue and resolve to come to a vote upon it. It is certainly a question of no secondary importance, but on the contrary a question of the first consequence, and I cannot vote as I usually do with the honorable Senator to take up measures from the Committee on Finance.

I desire, with the leave of the Senate, for a reason that will be apparent, to ask leave to be excused before I take my seat from serving further upon the select committee on slavery and freedmen. There are other Senators that have arrived here who have not a place on committees, and I do it with that view. I hope the place will be filled by motion from some Senators. I ask to be excused from serving on that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to receiving that motion? The Chair hears none.

The motion to excuse the Senator from California was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Chair be authorized to fill the vacancy.

The motion was agreed to by unanimous consent, and the Vice President appointed Mr. NYE to fill the vacancy on the committee on slavery and freedmen; he also appointed Mr. STEWART to fill the vacancy on the Committee on Public Lands occasioned by the absence of Mr. HARDING, who in consequence of the state of his health has received leave of absence for the residue of the session.

Mr. FARWELL. I suggest to the Senate that a recess for one hour be taken. ["Oh, no!"]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on postponing the pending joint resolution for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill relative to the duty on paper.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply want to promote the business of the Senate; and as I see some of the members of the Committee on Finance will not vote to take up the bill I referred to, I withdraw the motion in the hope that by to-morrow at one o'clock we may get a vote on this question.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I desire to make a motion, and preliminary to that to state in a very few words my position. I am opposed to any legislation whatever upon this subject at this time. The right of the people of a State to vote for President is a constitutional right, and cannot be restricted or modified by any joint resolution of Congress. The right to count the vote in joint convention is devolved on that joint convention, and not upon this Congress. I do not believe that Congress has the constitutional power to say in advance what States shall be counted and what not. I will trust the convention when the certificates are presented of the votes from the several States. I do not believe we have the power here as an act of legislation to control the counting of the votes in joint convention. I therefore move the indefinite postponement of the resolution and pending amendments.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will withdraw his motion and let us take a vote on the indefinite postponement of the question we may settle it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am perfectly well satisfied we cannot get through with this question to-night. There are several Senators who desire to speak.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us try.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adjournment, and it is not a matter of debate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I insist on my motion to adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Powell, Sprague, Sumner, and Wilkinson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Clark, Conness, Davis, Foster, Hale, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Sherman, Stewart, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Chandler, Font, Grimes, Harding, Hendricks, Hicks, McDougall, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Wright—15.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to postpone the joint resolution indefinitely.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARLAN (when Mr. GRIMES's name was called) said: As this is in the nature of a test vote, I am authorized to state that my colleague is paired with the Senator from Kansas, Mr. POMEROY, and that if my colleague were here he would vote for a resolution similar to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, (when Mr. POMEROY's name was called,) said: My colleague is absent, having been paired off with Mr. GRIMES.

The result was announced—yeas 11, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Doolittle, Farwell, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wiley—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Foster, Hale, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Powell, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Wilson and Wright—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Chandler, Foot, Grimes, Harding, Hendricks, Hicks, McDougall, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Richardson, Riddle, and Saut-bury—14.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WILKINSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, there being, on a division—ayes 20, noes 16; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 2, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LAW. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that the gentleman from Illinois will yield to me that I may have a bill referred.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 322) for the construction of the Illinois ship-canal. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] moved last evening an amendment, which the Clerk was about to report when the House adjourned.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask unanimous consent that a bill may be postponed.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done unless the gentleman from Illinois withdraws the call for the regular order.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I rise to a question of order. When the Illinois ship-canal bill was before the House at the last session, it was postponed to a day certain, which was the same day to which the Niagara ship-canal bill was postponed, so that one was immediately to follow the other. When the Niagara ship-canal bill came up it was further postponed. I listened most attentively and heard no order made with regard to this bill. I therefore insist that it is not now entitled to take precedence of other business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana, last evening, and the gentleman from Wisconsin, this morning, have raised a question of fact with the Chair in reference to the business, and the Chair will have the Journal of last Monday read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"On motion of Mr. STEVENS,

"Ordered, That the consideration of the bills of this House No. 126 and 322, heretofore made a special order for this day and from day to day until disposed of, be postponed until Wednesday next, the 1st day of February, immediately after the Journal is read."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] so that the question may be settled, whether he did or not move to postpone the special order.

Mr. STEVENS. I did move to postpone both special orders.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I did not know that the attention of the House had been called to the matter before. I was not present at the time. I listened to the motion but I did not understand that this was included.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Indiana desires me to withdraw my call for the regular order of business, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania also wants it withdrawn. I withdraw it for both gentlemen.

Mr. HOLMAN. I also want to present a matter.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will withdraw it for the gentleman.

SURVIVING REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

Mr. LAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions a bill in favor of the surviving revolutionary soldiers.

Mr. STEVENS. I did not understand that the gentleman from Illinois yielded for any such purpose.

Mr. LAW. When I state the object of the proposition I am sure that the House will adopt it unanimously, as it is reported unanimously from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. Speaker, it will be recollected that at the last session of Congress we adopted a measure giving to the survivors of the revolutionary army a donation each of $100 in addition to what they had before. Since then, out of those twelve gallant and patriotic men, seven have gone to their long homes. We have then only five survivors of the army of Washington during the revolutionary war. In consequence of the payments being made on the 1st of January and 1st of July, five out of the seven who have died have only received fifty dollars. They have gone to their graves before they had received $100.

I ask that the bill I now report be put on its passage, and I will say, in reference to it, that its effect will be not only great upon the Army where each individual mentioned in this bill has grandchildren and great-grandchildren, not only in the Army of the United States, but throughout the country.

I have in my hand a book from which I will read a short passage, to show you the patriotism of these men. Every man here ought to have a copy of the book, which is called "The Last Men of the Revolution." It ought to be in the hands of every member of Congress and every friend of the Union. I will read a few lines in reference to one of these survivors:

"His mind is still vigorous, though his body is feeble. His memory is good, retaining dates especially, so that he is the referee in the family in matters of history. He is deeply interested in the present conflict, his whole soul being enlisted in the cause of his country. Speaking of General Grant and his prospects of success in his campaign against Richmond, he concluded by saying, 'Well, I know two old folks up here in Maine who are praying for him.' He has lost four or five grandchildren in the war."

Now, sir, this bill proposes to give the surviving soldiers of the Revolution—these five, and some of them may not now be living—the small gratuity of $300 a year during their natural lives. It is to make their pathway in life, which must now be short, as pleasant as possible; and it is not more than a just tribute on the part of the Congress of the United States. We give them this small gratuity for the intelligence and bravery employed by them in bringing about our independence.

I send the bill to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The bill, which was read, directs that there shall be paid to each of the surviving soldiers of the Revolution, five in number, whose names are on the pension rolls, $300 as a gratuity, in addition to the pension now paid them.

No objection being made, the bill was reported, read a first and second time by its title, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I wish to suggest an amendment, which I think will meet the approbation of the House.

Mr. LAW. What is it?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I suggest that the payment of $300 be in gold. It will be more grateful to the old soldiers, reminding them of former times.

Mr. LAW. I think we had better pass the bill as it is. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill, being engrossed, was read the third time, and passed unanimously.

Mr. LAW moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND-GRANT RAILROADS.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution in relation to certain railroads; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the resolution may be printed.

Mr. ANCONA. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it will be printed. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The resolution having been read and referred, that motion is in order.

The motion was agreed to.

CABINET MINISTERS IN CONGRESS.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] in reference to Cabinet ministers having seats on the floor of the two Houses, and which was made a special order for to-morrow, may be postponed for one week.

Mr. PENDLETON. If that will subserve the convenience of the Committee of Ways and Means I will not object to that arrangement. I am not disposed to thrust that matter in the way of the important business of that committee.

No objection being made, the consideration of the bill was postponed for one week from to-morrow.

GUNBOAT FOR LIBERIA.

On motion of Mr. COX, and by unanimous consent, Senate bill No. 356, authorizing the President of the United States to transfer a gunboat to the Government of the republic of Liberia, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PAY OF CERTAIN OFFICERS OF THE ARMY.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the bill of the House (H. R. No. 583) to amend the twenty-first section of the act entitled "An act to define the pay and emolument of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, together with the amendments of the Senate thereto, was taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

APPRAISEMENT OF IMPORTED MERCHANDISE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend the acts relating to officers employed in the examination and appraisal of imported merchandise in the district of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL ACADEMY PAPERS.

Mr. PATTERSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution authorizing the National Academy to publish certain papers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORT ON WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was referred, under the rules, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the communication from the Secretary of the Interior, inclosing a supplemental report from the chief engineer of the Washington aqueduct, be printed, together with said report, for the use of the aqueduct department.

MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, introduced a bill to provide for the subdivision of the gold and silver lands of the United States, and others containing valuable minerals, for the coining of the products of such lands, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

CLAIMS OF LOYAL CITIZENS.

Mr. YEAMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill concerning the claims of loyal citizens of loyal States, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ARREARAGES OF PAY AND BOUNTY.

Mr. ANCONA, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill amendatory of the acts providing for the payment of arrearages of pay and bounty due heirs of deceased soldiers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Militia.

LAND CLAIMS—WISCONSIN.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to quiet the titles to certain public lands granted to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of certain railroads; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CAROLINE L. WRIGHT.

Mr. TRACY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Caroline L. Wright; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. ELIOT, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the Senate amendments to the bill of the House (No. 51) to create a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, made a report; which was read.

The report was as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 51) entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs," having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendment to the said bill, and the committee agree to the following as a substitute:

An Act to establish a Department of Freedmen and Abandoned Lands.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby established at the seat of Government of the United States, a Department of Freedmen and Abandoned Lands, whose object shall be the good of the freedmen and the administration of lands and other property falling to the national Government in the rebel States not heretofore appropriated to other uses. And this department shall be under the care of a Commissioner, who shall be appointed by the President, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with an annual salary of $4,000.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Freedmen and Abandoned Lands shall appoint a chief clerk, with an annual salary of $2,000, who shall act also as disbursing officer, and who in all cases during the necessary absence of the Commissioner, or when the principal office shall become vacant, shall perform the duties of Commissioner; and also such number of clerks, not exceeding two of each class, as shall be necessary. And the Commissioner and all persons appointed under this act shall, before entering upon their duties, take the oath of office prescribed in the act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862. And the Commissioner and the chief clerk shall, before entering upon their duties, give bonds to the Treasurer of the United States, the former in the sum of $100,000 and the latter in the sum of $10,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of their duties respectively, with sureties to be approved as sufficient by the Attorney General, which bonds shall be filed in the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, to be by him put in suit for the benefit of any injured party upon any breach of the conditions thereof.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall, under the direction of the President, create districts of freedmen and abandoned lands within the rebel States, not to exceed two in each State, so far as the same may be brought under the military power of the United States; and each district shall be under the supervision of an assistant commissioner, with an annual salary of $2,500, under bond as required for the chief clerk, to be appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and with authority to appoint local superintendents and clerks, so far as the same may be needed, not, however, more than four in each district, each of whom shall have an annual compensation not exceeding $1,500.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall have the general superintendence of all freedmen throughout the several districts, and he shall watch over the execution of all laws, proclamations, and military orders of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen; and he shall establish regulations from time to time, and cause the same to be enforced for their needful and judicious treatment, protecting them in the enjoyment of their rights, promoting their welfare, and securing to them and their posterity the blessings of liberty. And every such freedman shall be treated in all respects as a freeman, with all proper remedies in courts of justice, and no power or control shall be exercised with regard to him except in conformity with law.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the assistant commissioners, under the direction of the Commissioner and within their respective districts, shall take possession of all abandoned real estate belonging to disloyal persons, and all real estate to which the United States have title, or of which the United States have possession, and not already appropriated to Government uses, and all property found on and belonging to such estate, and shall rent or lease such real estate or any portions thereof to freedmen, or permit the same to be cultivated, used, or occupied by them on such terms and under such regulations as the assistant commissioner and such freedmen may agree; and if the lands with the property aforesaid shall not be required for the freedmen, then they shall rent or lease the same to other persons on such terms and under such regulations as shall be mutually agreed upon, and no freedman shall be employed on any estate above mentioned otherwise than according to voluntary contract reduced to writing and certified by the assistant commissioner or local superintendent: Provided, That no lease, permission to occupy, or contract, shall be for a longer period than one year, and all papers required or authorized by this act shall remain valid and effectual although no revenue stamp is attached thereto. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the due execution of process against the real estate or property above named issued in due course of law from any court of competent jurisdiction; but the possession of such real estate or property by any purchaser thereof at a judicial sale shall be postponed until the termination of any outstanding contract duly made and executed under the provisions of this act.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the assistant commissioners and local superintendents shall, as advisory guardians, aid the freedmen in the adjustment of their wages, or in the application of their labor; that they shall take care that the freedmen do not suffer from ill-treatment or any failure of contract on the part of others; that they shall do what they can as arbitrators to reconcile and settle any differences in which freedmen may be involved with each other or with other persons; and, in case such differences are carried before any tribunal, civil or military, they shall appear as next friends of the freedmen, so far as to see that the case is fairly stated and heard. And in all such proceedings there shall be no disability or exclusion on account of color.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That leases heretofore made by the supervising special agents of the Treasury Department, under the authority of the General Order, three hundred and thirty-one, of the Secretary of War, dated October 9, 1863, and in accordance with the regulations of the Treasury Department, shall have the same effect as if made by assistant commissioners under this act; but such lease shall not continue beyond the period of one year from its date; and immediately upon the organization of any district of freedmen and abandoned lands such agents shall cease to execute their functions within such district, and shall deliver over to the assistant commissioner thereof all property and papers held by them as agents. But all expenses necessarily incurred by such agents in any district prior to its organization under this act, shall be defrayed by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any moneys in his hands arising from the leases made by such agents.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall apply the proceeds accruing under this act to defray the expenses of this department, so that the same may become at an early day self-supporting; and any proceeds over and above such expenses shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That whenever the Commissioner cannot otherwise employ any of the freedmen who may come under his care, he shall so far as practicable make provision for them with humane and suitable persons, at a just compensation for their services.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is charged with furnishing the military and other support needful to carry this act into effect, and any military officer may be appointed under this act without increase of salary.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall, before the commencement of each regular session of Congress, make full report of his proceedings, with exhibits of the state of his accounts, to the President, who shall communicate the same to Congress, and shall also make special reports whenever required to do so by the President or either House of Congress. And the assistant commissioners shall make quarterly reports of their proceedings to the Commissioner, and also such other special reports as from time to time may be required. And it shall be the duty of all officers, civil and military, charged with the execution of any law, proclamation, or military order of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen not mustered into or regularly engaged in the military service, to make return to the Commissioner of all their proceedings in execution thereof, under such regulations as shall from time to time be prescribed.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That all assistant commissioners, local superintendents, and clerks, as well as supervising special agents, shall be so far deemed to be in the military service of the United States as to be liable to trial by courts-martial or military commissions, to be ordered by the commanding general of the military department within which they act as such assistant commissioners, local superintendents, clerks, or supervising special agents. And for all offenses amounting to a felony; for any act of embezzlement or willful misappropriation of public or private property; for any willful act of oppression of any freedman, or of any loyal inhabitant; for any act of taking or receiving, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value on account of any act done or omitted by them in their official capacity, or for being in any manner interested in any purchase of cotton, tobacco, sugar, or any other article produced upon any lands leased or worked under the provisions of this act, or for any other willful violation of their official duties, upon conviction thereof, shall be subject to punishment by fine not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment at hard labor for a period not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the last clause of a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

THOMAS D. ELIOT,
WILLIAM D. KELLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.
CHARLES SUMNER,
J. M. HOWARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, I will endeavor to state, so that it may be understood by the House what are the differences between the bill reported by the committee of conference and the bill which was passed by the House at the last session.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Eliot] whether he proposes to ask for the adoption of this report this morning. I think it is too important and too voluminous for the House to pass upon without seeing it. I think we ought to have it printed before we are called upon to act upon it. I therefore ask the gentleman to consent to have it postponed to some certain day, in order that we may act upon it understandingly.

Mr. ELIOT. I will reply to my friend from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] by stating that after I shall have concluded the statement I desire to make, if it shall be the judgment of the House that there shall be a postponement before final action, I do not know that I shall make any objection. But I now propose to state distinctly how the question stands, in order that gentlemen may judge how to act.

It will be remembered that the bill which was passed by the House at the last session attached the Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs to the War Department; that the bill which was subsequently passed by the Senate as an amendment to the House bill attached that bureau to the Treasury Department. The first question which the managers upon the part of the two Houses had to discuss and to determine was the Department to which the bureau should be attached properly. I believed, and the House, in maintaining the committee that reported the bill concurred in that belief, that it was better, under the circumstances in which we were placed, that the bureau should be connected with the War Department; because we were in a condition of war, because it seemed that the inspiration of that Department would be required to make the bill effective; and because, with the knowledge that we had of the interest taken in that subject by the distinguished head of that Department, we might feel assured that no opportunity would be omitted to enforce properly the provisions of the bill for the benefit of the persons for whom we were legislating.

But there was this great difficulty which had to be encountered and removed. During the last two or three years there has been no little legislation upon the subject of abandoned lands and confiscated property and abandoned personal estate. And from the earliest legislation on the subject down to the present time the care, the charge, the custody, and the disposition of that property has been by various laws placed in the Treasury Department. And it was said that, in order to make the proposed legislation useful, it would be necessary to repeal in part or wholly previous legislation; and that it would occasion greater inconvenience than any benefit which we expected from its connection with the War Department would balance. Besides, it was urged that if the bureau be connected with the War Department it would be needful to make a division of the lands, leaving so much as would not be wanted for freedmen's use in the care of the Treasury Department, and giving to the care of the War Department so much as would be wanted for the purposes of this bureau. And it was contended that if that were done there would be collision continually arising concerning the lands between the officers or agents of the two Departments which would very greatly embarrass the operations of the law.

It did not appear to the managers on the part of the House that these objections were sufficient to balance those which existed against placing this bureau in the Treasury Department. But on this point no agreement could be arrived at, and it became necessary to determine whether a satisfactory bill could be prepared not connecting the bureau with either executive Department. The great importance of some efficient legislation was recognized, and no other course could be adopted. It was more important that some immediate effective plan of action should be agreed upon than that any particular mode should be adopted, and it was believed that a department might be established, communicating directly with the President, not an executive Department, of course, but one similar to the Department of Agriculture as it was at first created. There are some strong reasons why such a department, self-acting, not dependent immediately upon the War or the Treasury, would be more useful than it could be if otherwise constituted. Such a department would more probably enable the Government to secure the services of some Commissioner of great ability, and of experience and character. The amount of compensation fixed by the bill has not been increased, but the very fact that the Commissioner would communicate directly with the President, and with Congress, would give to the department a more desirable character than any bureau could have. The jurisdiction of the department would be large, and its duties important and varied, and we believed that the work needful to be done would justify us in placing it upon an independent foundation. Indeed, it had been, I ought to say, the subject of examination before the committee on the part of the House, as I learned it had also been in the Senate committee, before the bill had been acted upon originally by the House, it being believed then that there were strong reasons why it should be rather a department connected with the President than a bureau connected with either executive Department.

I may also say that those members of our conference committed who could not so fully agree to the provisions of the bill as to sign the report of the committee were of the belief that any bill would be more probably effective and useful if disconnected from the Treasury or the War Department.

The bill, as it is reported, received very critical and careful examination. Every section and every provision was discussed. I believe that it is carefully guarded, and calculated to effect the wishes of those who desired action and who believe that we are called upon to legislate in behalf of those whose recently bestowed freedom finds them unused to self-reliance and dependent for a season somewhat upon our sympathy and aid.

Now, sir, this bill presents to the House no new proposition. Substantially, every provision contained there will be found, I believe, either in the provisions of the House bill or in the provisions of the Senate bill. Many of them are combinations of features of both bills; and if gentlemen will give me their attention, I will explain what are the differences.

The first section of the bill creates a department of freedmen and abandoned lands, and the formal part of this bill and of the other sections of the bill are similar to those contained in the law creating the Department of Agriculture. That act was drawn with a great deal of care, and upon an examination of it it was found that, so far as its provisions could be made applicable here, it was desirable to adopt them. The precedent seemed to be a good one, and the language of the act commended itself to the committee.

The department is established at the seat of Government; and the first section of the bill puts under the care of the department the lands and other property falling to the national Government in the rebel States, and not heretofore appropriated to other uses. The Commissioner is to be appointed by the President. The salary is to be $4,000, the same as was assigned to that office before; and I will say here that under this bill no greater expense is to be incurred than was contemplated in the bill which the House passed at the last session.

The Commissioner, in the second section of the bill, is authorized to appoint his subordinate officers. The first of these is the chief clerk, with a salary of $2,000, who shall be a disbursing officer, as was provided in the bill which was passed by the House. In the absence of the Commissioner, he is called up to discharge the duties of the Commissioner, as is provided in the act establishing the Department of Agriculture. The clerks to be appointed are of the same class and the same number as were provided by the bill passed by the House. The Commissioner and the other officers are required to take the oath of allegiance prescribed by the act of Congress. The Commissioner is to give bond in the sum of $100,000; and the chief clerk and the assistant commissioners afterward provided for are required to give bond in the sum of $10,000. I think it will be seen that this is an improvement upon either of the bills before presented, securing a high order of ability and excluding applications for these higher offices by some who might think themselves qualified to discharge the duties.

The third section of the bill is a modification of the fourth section of the bill which was passed by the House, and is substantially the second section of the bill as it passed the Senate. It provides that the Commissioner, under the care of the President, shall create districts of freedmen, not exceeding two in each State so far as they may be brought under the military power of the United States. That each district shall be under the supervision of an assistant commissioner, his salary being fixed at the same amount as in the bill passed by the House last year. These assistant commissioners are required to give bonds. They have power to appoint local superintendents as may be needed, not however exceeding four in each district, which is the limitation on the number as contained in the bill passed by the Senate, at a compensation not exceeding $1,500 each.

The fourth section of the bill will be found in the third section of the House bill and the fourth section of the Senate bill. It is a combination of them both. Gentlemen have had them on their tables in print for months. It provides that the Commissioner shall have general supervision of the freedmen throughout the several districts, watching over the execution of the laws, proclamations, and military orders concerning them, making regulations from time to time, and causing them to be enforced for their needful and judicious treatment, and protecting them in the enjoyment of their rights.

The fifth section is a material modification of the fifth section of the Senate bill, and contains some of the provisions of the fourth section of the House bill. It provides that the assistant commissioners shall, within their departments or districts, take possession of abandoned real estate belonging to disloyal persons, and all real estate to which the United States have title, or of which they have possession, and which have not been heretofore appropriated to Government uses.

Mr. GANSON. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether, under that clause of his bill, this bureau would not have authority to take possession and lease all the mineral lands of the Government? I would like to have that clause of the bill read.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman will find it in print. I will read it from the substitute:

That the assistant commissioners, under the direction of the Commissioner, and within their respective districts, shall take possession of all abandoned real estate belonging to all disloyal persons, and all real estate to which the United States have title, or of which the United States have possession, and not already appropriated to Government uses, and all property found on and belonging to such estate; and shall rent or lease such real estate or any portions thereof to freedmen, or permit the same to be cultivated, used, or occupied by them on such terms and under such regulations as the assistant commissioner and such freedmen may agree.

Mr. GANSON. I do not find in that clause anything restricting the jurisdiction of this department.

Mr. ELIOT. It is confined to lands in the rebel States.

Mr. GANSON. That clause seems to draw a distinction between lands properly belonging to disloyal people and lands the title to which are invested in the United States. It seems to include all such lands.

Mr. ELIOT. I think that the gentleman is mistaken, and will find that his criticism is not well founded. The property taken possession of is rented or leased according to the terms of the bill heretofore passed. The contracts are provided for and limited to one year. No contract is to be for more than twelve months. There is a provision contained in this section which, as I recollect the history of the case, was introduced as an amendment by an honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, which will not be objected to by gentlemen on the other side. It is as follows:

But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the due execution of process against the real estate or property above named issued in due course of law from any court of competent jurisdiction, but the possession of such real estate or property by any purchaser thereof at a judicial sale shall be postponed until the termination of any outstanding contract duly made and executed under the provisions of this act.

The sixth section of the bill is substantially the sixth section of the Senate bill as found upon the files of the House. It is an enlargement of some of the provisions of the fourth section of the House bill. It provides that the assistant commissioners and superintendents shall act as advisory guardians to aid the freedmen in the adjustment of their wages, to take care that the freedmen shall not suffer from ill-treatment or failure to perform contracts, to act as arbitrators, and, so far as practicable, to reconcile and settle controversies arising among the freedmen, or between freedmen and other persons.

The seventh section is substantially the same that was introduced in a bill in the House by the honorable gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Blow.] It was referred by him to the committee on the rebellious States. Whether reported by them or not I do not remember. It is, however, the same section which will be found in the Senate bill as section seven; and it provides simply that certain leases which were made under the direction of the Treasury Department, and under authority of Order No. 331 from the War Department, dated October 9, 1863, in accordance with the regulation of the Treasury Department, shall have the same effect as if those leases had been made by the assistant commissioners under this act. But it provides that the leases shall not continue beyond one year; and it will operate now upon very few. It was deemed advisable to report this section, in the first place, because it was right to do it. It had been the subject of examination last winter, and there seemed to be no objection to adopting it from the Senate bill. It contains no other legislation than that, but it requires that when this department goes into operation all the agents who have charge of those affairs in the Treasury Department shall transfer their papers and property to this department.

The eighth section of the bill provides, as the fourth section of the House bill and as the eighth section of the Senate bill do, for the application of the proceeds. It declares that the Commissioner shall apply the proceeds accruing under this act to defraying the expenses of this department, so that it shall, as soon as possible, be self-sustaining; and it provides that any proceeds above those expenses shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The ninth section is one which was originally offered during the debate upon this bill in the Senate, and provides simply that whenever the Commissioner cannot otherwise employ any of the freedmen who may come under his charge, he shall, so far as he may, make provision for them with humane and suitable persons at a fair and reasonable compensation. It was offered originally, I believe, by the honorable Senator from West Virginia.

The tenth section in its present form is new, because of the fact that the department is not connected with the War Department. It provides that the President of the United States shall furnish the military and other support needful to carry this act into effect, and any military officer may be appointed under the provisions of this act without increasing his salary. That section was prepared with care. There are gentlemen who, I have no doubt, will still think that this bureau had better be a bureau of the War Department; but it is believed that under the provision of this section it will be entirely practicable to make the department effective and operative, and to provide for it all the needful and military aid, and to give to it all the support which will be needed at this time, and which the Government can supply.

The eleventh section of the bill is drawn from the second and fourth sections of the House bill, and is a combination of the ninth and tenth sections of the Senate bill—all the provisions, however, being found in those two bills. It provides that the Commissioner, before the commencement of each session of Congress, shall make a report of his proceedings, with exhibits showing the state of his accounts, to the President of the United States, who will communicate them to Congress, and that the assistant commissioners shall make quarterly returns to the Commissioner, and more frequent reports if the Commissioner shall desire. And it is made the duty of the officers, military and civil, charged with the execution of any law, or proclamation, or order concerning freedmen, to make returns to the Commissioner of their doings. Those provisions have all been acted upon by the House heretofore.

The twelfth section of the bill is a section which was offered in the Senate, and which is intended to prevent the commission of crime and to provide for its punishment. It provides that the assistant commissioners and superintendents and clerks under this bill shall be deemed to be in the military service of the United States, so as to be liable to trial by courts-martial to be ordered by the commanding general of the military department. The section goes on to provide that for all offenses amounting to felony, for acts of embezzlement, for the willful misappropriation of property, either public or private, for willful acts of oppression of freedmen or loyal inhabitants, for the act of taking or receiving money or things of value, for acts done or omitted to be done officially, or being interested in the purchase of coffee, sugar, or tobacco, or any other article produced upon the lands within the charge of this department, or any other willful violation of official duty, there shall be punishment by imprisonment and by fine.

I will say here that upon careful deliberation our committee were persuaded that for the protection of all parties it was desirable to adopt this provision as contained in the Senate bill; and with the name of the distinguished Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] one of the ablest and soundest lawyers in the Senate, attached to this report, I think no gentleman need be apprehensive that any constitutional provision is violated by this section.

The thirteenth section of the bill is a section repealing the last clause of the joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862. It simply provides for the repeal of that clause of the joint resolution.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to make some suggestions upon this question at some time or other, and if the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me, I can do it now by way of inquiry.

Mr. ELIOT. I will say to the gentleman from New York that I propose in the discharge of my duty, when I have finished making the statement that I desire to make, to call for the previous question. If the House shall second the previous question it will give me pleasure to allow to the gentleman from New York such time as I understand from him he would desire to explain his views in reference to this section or to other sections of the bill. If the House shall decline to second the previous question I shall have done my duty, and the whole matter will then be within the control of the House.

Mr. WILSON. I merely desire to state, in order that the gentleman from New York and others may hear it, that after the gentleman from Massachusetts shall have concluded his explanation of the bill, I intend to move to postpone this subject for one week from to-day, so that the bill may be printed, in order that we may all examine it.

Mr. KERNAN. If the gentleman from Massachusetts would allow me to occupy a few minutes of his time at the conclusion of his remarks, I should be much obliged to him.

Mr. ELIOT. I will say frankly to the gentleman from New York that if the House are disposed to have this bill acted on now he shall have a portion of the time to which I shall be entitled after the previous question is sustained; but if the House prefers, under the circumstances, to have this matter postponed in order that the bill may be printed, then I submit that his remarks had better be postponed also.

Mr. KERNAN. It may be that I shall not be here at the time to which the bill will be postponed, and I should therefore like to call the attention of the House to the subject now. I ask the gentleman, for this reason, to allow me a few minutes when he has finished his statement.

Mr. ELIOT. How many minutes?

Mr. KERNAN. Ten or fifteen.

Mr. ELIOT. That is a kind of request that I am unwilling to say no to.

Mr. CHANLER. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he allow this bill to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ELIOT. Well, sir, I cannot agree to that.

Mr. CHANLER. If the gentleman will allow me, at the proper time I think I can suggest sufficient reasons for pursuing that course.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me a few moments now? I will be very brief.

Mr. ELIOT. I am not quite through yet.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that a resolution was passed by the House on the 5th of January last, referring the matter of refugees to the Committee on Military Affairs. After deliberating upon the subject, the committee reported House bill No. 698 "for the relief of refugees and freedmen," which was recommitted, and I have had it ready for some time in my drawer to report back to the House with two proposed amendments.

Now, I desire to be heard upon this subject in connection with the report made by the committee of conference, but if we are to have the previous question put upon us, and are not to be permitted to see this bill in print, which is a long one, of many sections, and neither the House bill nor the Senate bill, but a new bill made in the committee of conference, before the previous question is sustained I should like to interject a few remarks, as a gentleman from Illinois said the other day. I shall vote, however, for the motion of which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] has given notice, if he shall have an opportunity of making it, to postpone the bill for one week, and have it printed, so that we may know what it is that we are considering. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, if that does not take place, if he will permit me also to have a few moments of his time?

Mr. ELIOT. I will with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to ask the gentleman if the previous question, which he proposes to call, will cut off all amendments or any substitute that might be offered?

Mr. ELIOT. I will say to the gentleman that under the rules of the House there can be no amendment offered, for it is the report of a committee of conference, and must be adopted as it is or rejected as it is. There can be no alteration made in it.

Mr. SMITH. Then no substitute can be offered for it?

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir. I am not disposed to say a word upon this thirteenth section which repeals the last clause of the confiscation resolution. The House has more than once expressed its judgment on the subject, and I am content to let it remain where it stands without comment.

The fourteenth section is simply a repealing section of inconsistent acts.

Now, it will be seen that the effect of this bill will be to take away from the Treasury Department and from the Treasury agents and employes the lands and property which have been heretofore placed under their charge, and the whole will be confided to the Commissioner and the officers appointed under him in this department. I want to say that there has been a very loud call from all portions of the country that some legislation should be had upon this subject. There has recently been a convention in this city, attended by delegates from all sections of the North, the Northwest, and the East, and they have united in calling upon us to delay no longer our action in behalf of these freedmen. Whether it goes to the War Department or to the Treasury, their prayer is, give us some bill under the provisions of which the Government may act. The time has come when it is necessary that this action should be had. I cannot but feel that we have done wrong in not having long before now extended to these people a hand of welcome and of support. They have well deserved it. They have been faithful to us in fort and camp and field. Many lives have been lost and much suffering endured while we have delayed action. Now, sir, whether it is done to-day or next week is not a matter of importance, excepting so far as that every day's delay makes the suffering greater on the part of these freedmen, and it is because I have felt that, and because of the instructions I have from the committee, that I shall ask the House to pass now upon the report. But if they think that it had better be postponed, we shall have no other objection to it than the one which I have named. And now, sir, for the purpose of having the House determine whether this matter shall be passed upon now or delayed, I call the previous question.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] withdraw that motion for a few moments?

Mr. ELIOT. I will withdraw the motion for the previous question, and yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KERNAN] if he will renew the motion when he has concluded his remarks.

Mr. KERNAN. I will do so.

Mr. SCHENCK. What becomes of my share of the time by this arrangement?

Mr. ELIOT. I will yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KERNAN] with the understanding that he gives a portion of it to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK].

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the motion for the previous question operates at the end of the hour.

Mr. ELIOT. That is my motion; I yield the remainder of the hour to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KERNAN] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK].

Mr. KERNAN. Even if I had the time I would not enter into any extended discussion of the details of this bill. I appreciate the benevolent efforts of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] to alleviate in some way the sufferings of this class of persons and promote their welfare. From all the accounts we have, they are suffering wherever they have come within the lines of our armies. But in my judgment experience shows that the policy proposed to be inaugurated by this bill will not accomplish the benevolent intentions of its promoters toward these people. They are a very numerous class of persons; and the policy of this bill seems to be to regulate, control, and govern this large class of persons by a code of laws, under the name of regulations, which regulations are to be made and administered by an appointee of the President and the Senate called a Commissioner. Lands are to be assigned and leased to them. There are to be superintendents to regulate their employment and wages, decide their controversies, and pay the surplus of their earnings, over and above expenses, into the Treasury of the United States. In my judgment this policy will not work out satisfactorily any such social problem as that presented by the colored population of the southern States. You will not be able to really benefit this class of persons by placing them by the hundred thousand under the guardianship and subject to the control of a Commissioner who is to make regulations for their government, and by his agents manage and control them. Some other mode of dealing with this question must be devised, if there is to be any effectual, benevolent, or economical action in reference to this class of persons.

Again, where and to what consequences will this policy lead? According to this bill the Government, by a bureau like that of Agriculture, is to take charge of people by the hundred thousand in States of this Union, and become their guardians, and regulate them by special provisions and regulations to be made by an appointee of the President. Does any man believe that we will succeed in benefiting this really suffering class by any such measure as this?

But I particularly desire to call the attention of the House to the twelfth section of the bill, which, if this bill is to pass, I trust will be stricken out. I earnestly hope there will be no further legislation by Congress to subject civilians to trial and punishment by military commissions.

This twelfth section provides that the superintendents, clerks, and all others connected with this proposed bureau shall be tried for all sorts of alleged offenses by military commissions. Where do we get the power to pass any such law? The Constitution declares that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger; that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; and that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right of a trial by an impartial jury. Does any one believe that we can constitutionally subject a class of civilians to the jurisdiction of these military tribunals by declaring, as this twelfth section does, that they shall be deemed to belong to the Army or Navy of the United States, or engaged in its military or naval service? As well might we take the right of trial by jury from any other class of citizens as from the class subjected to trial and punishment by military tribunals under this twelfth section. They can in no sense be correctly said to belong to the Army or Navy. They are civilians, employed in purely civil affairs. If we can do this, we can take away the right of any class of civilians by saying that they shall be deemed to be in the military service of the United States, when we know that all their duties are duties of civilians.

Sir, I submit that the experience of the last few years must have made it apparent to every gentleman here that these military commissions are characterized by a want of certainty as to the conviction of the guilty and the certainty of frequently convicting the innocent. Acts of Congress have been passed declaring that certain contractors and other parties should be deemed to be in the military service and subject to trial by these commissions; and you have had military commissions sitting in this city and elsewhere in the loyal States, trying men who never were of the class mentioned in the acts of Congress, and there seems to be no power to take them from under the control of these military tribunals or to get any review of their decisions. Now, I trust that we shall take no further steps in the direction of subjecting civilians, I care not of what class, to this unconstitutional mode of trial. We should be warned by the history of these courts, not only in this country, but in other countries. The Court of High Commission in England, under the influence of those who desired that arbitrary power should prevail, carried its oppressive proceedings to such an extent as to bring on a collision, as such assumptions of power must do in any country where liberty is to be preserved. There is no good reason why these men, for felony, or embezzlement, or any other offense, shall not be tried under the guarantees of the Constitution and in accordance with the forms and by the tribunals which it prescribes. We should do something to put a stop to and guard against the wrongs which innocent men have suffered by being deprived of trial by jury and by being subjected to military commissions. I refer gentlemen to a statement made a few days ago in the other end of the Capitol by a distinguished Senator, that a military commission is sometimes efficient for the conviction of those who have become obnoxious to parties by exposing frauds upon the Government.

Again, the thirteenth section of this bill proposes to do, what? To repeal the joint resolution made a part of the act of Congress as to confiscation, passed in July, 1862, by which confiscation was limited to the life estate in land of the traitor. This subject, the repeal of this joint resolution, has been fully discussed in this House. A bill to effect this was passed at the last session, and went to the Senate. The Judiciary Committee of that body reported, as I understand, unanimously, that that bill ought not to pass. That bill died. Yet now there is an attempt to effect the same object by passing this bill, which comes from a conference committee of the two Houses, and has never been subjected to the scrutiny of any regular committee of either House. I trust that we shall not pass a bill repealing that joint resolution until there has at least been some discussion or scrutiny of the matter. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the message of the President of the United States, approving of the confiscation act, and the joint resolution as a part of it, now proposed to be repealed; and I ask members on the other side of the House whether they are prepared to enact a law on the subject of confiscation, which President Lincoln declared he could not sign because it was in violation of the Constitution, without discussion or examination by any appropriate committee. This is the effect of passing the bill now before us.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"That to which I chiefly object pervades most part of the act, but more distinctly appears in the first, second, seventh, and eighth sections. It is the sum of those provisions which results in the divesting of title forever.

"For the causes of treason and ingredients of treason, not amounting to the full crime, it declares forfeiture extending beyond the lives of the guilty parties; whereas the Constitution of the United States declares that no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained. True, there is to be no formal attainder in this case; still, I think the greater punishment cannot be constitutionally inflicted in a different form for the same offense.

"With great respect, I am constrained to say I think this feature of the act is unconstitutional."

"Again, this act, in rem, forfeits property for the ingredients of treason without a conviction of the supposed criminal or a personal hearing given him in any proceeding. That we may not touch property lying within our reach because we cannot give personal notice to an owner who is absent endeavoring to destroy the Government, is certainly satisfactory. Still, the owner may not be thus engaged; and I think a reasonable time should be provided for such parties to appear and have personal hearings. Similar provisions are not uncommon in connection with proceedings in rem."

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. Speaker, this was the language of the President of the United States in reference to the act of 1862, when submitted to him for his approval without the joint resolution explaining and limiting it. It is now proposed to repeal the joint resolution which induced him to approve the act, and to leave the latter in force as a law in the form in which the President declared he could not sign it because it was unconstitutional. In this message he says that unless Congress had passed this joint resolution he could not have approved the act, and that he approves the act and joint resolution as one law, the resolution limiting the forfeiture under the act to the life estate. Are you now going to vote for a bill repealing this joint resolution? Will you do so, without discussion or examination, on the report of a conference committee appointed upon a bill relative to a very different subject than confiscation? I appeal to the other side whether they will treat the President of the United States or this question in this way. Now, Mr. Speaker, I trust that the House at least, if it is seriously contemplated to pass this bill, will postpone its further consideration and have it printed, so as to allow gentlemen to examine and discuss it.

I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] for yielding me the floor long enough to make these suggestions.

Mr. ELIOT. I have been making an inquiry among the friends of the bill, and I find that they have a desire to have the bill more carefully considered than can now be done. I ask what will be the effect, under the rules, of a postponement of the report for one week, so that the bill may be printed and examined?

The SPEAKER. It will retain the privileged character of a conference report. When the time arrives to which it is postponed it will come up as if just presented by the conference committee.

Mr. ELIOT. Then I consent. I move that the further consideration of the conference report be postponed to this day week, and that the substitute be ordered to be printed. I believe that will suit the convenience of the friends of the measure. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved that the whole subject be laid upon the table; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 67, nays 83, not voting 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. So the subject was not laid on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. WEBSTER stated that he was paired with Mr. A. W. CLARK; and that he was opposed to the measure, while Mr. CLARK was in favor of it. The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question recurring on the demand for the previous question on the motion to postpone and print, the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT moved that the vote by which the report was postponed and ordered to be printed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] is upon the floor, being taken from it by the conference report.

RELIEF TO REFUGEES.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. ARNOLD. I will.

Mr. SCHENCK. On the 5th of January the House, by a resolution, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs the subject of relief to refugees. The committee prepared a bill, reported it to the House, and had it recommitted; and now the committee have instructed me to report that bill again to the House with two amendments. I therefore ask unanimous consent to report to the House the bill (H. R. No. 698) to establish in the War Department a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, including white and black, and that, with the amendments, it may be printed and made a special order immediately after the report of the conference committee, which has just been postponed, is disposed of. If that is done, if the action on the report of the conference disposes of the whole subject, this matter can easily be disposed of; otherwise it will be in a position to be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if this bill is made the special order at that time, in all probability it would not be reached then. The conference report being a privileged matter would come up at that time; but there being already several special orders set down before that time, they will take precedence of this matter.

Mr. MORRILL. I must object to any more special orders until we have acted upon the tax bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I shall not insist upon making it a special order, for I think myself it is impolitic to make special orders. I will ask unanimous consent to report the bill and have it printed.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman desires to have it printed and recommitted.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask that a memorial of the American Union Commission in relation to the condition of refugees within the Union lines of the United States, and praying the action of the Government in their behalf, may be printed and committed to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I object.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined, and found truly enrolled, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 142) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Philip H. Sheridan and the officers and men under his command; when the Speaker signed the same.

OFFICERS IN SUBSISTENCE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the War Department transmitting a list of officers in the subsistence department; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MEDALS FOR INDIAN CHIEFS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, asking an appropriation of $5,000 for medals for certain Indian chiefs, which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

INDIAN GOODS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior asking an appropriation to pay for supplies of goods purchased for Indians in place of certain goods destroyed; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ILLINOIS SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. ARNOLD. I now call up the unfinished business which was pending when the House adjourned yesterday, being the consideration of the Illinois ship-canal bill.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the substitute for the bill offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ARNOLD.] As the reading of the substitute was called for last evening, the Clerk will proceed to read it now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I called for the reading for the purpose of raising a point of order, but I now withdraw it.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me a few moments.

Mr. ARNOLD. Not at present. I desire that the House shall be brought to a direct vote at as early a period as possible upon the bill for the construction of the Illinois and Michigan ship-canal. It has been discussed repeatedly in this House; it has been the subject of various reports of committees; the bill has been printed and laid upon members' desks for a long period of time, and therefore I do not propose, on behalf of the bill, to occupy the time of the House.

Before demanding the previous question I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa, who desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend the substitute by adding thereto what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three commissioners to improve the Upper rapids and Lower or Des Moines rapids of the Mississippi river.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners shall forthwith make a careful examination of said Upper and Lower rapids of said river, and determine upon a suitable plan for the improvement aforementioned, which plan shall provide for the construction of a canal around each of said rapids to a width of not less than one hundred feet, with locks of not less than two hundred and seventy-five feet in length, and not less than seventy feet in width. Which improvements shall be made so as to insure a safe and uninterrupted water navigation, at all times during the season of navigation, of steamboats and other vessels drawing four feet of water. Which plan shall be submitted to the President of the United States for approval.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That upon the approval by the President of the United States of the plan of said improvement aforesaid, the said commissioners are hereby authorized to construct said canals according to said plan, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and to prosecute the same to completion with such dispatch as the nature of the work and the funds appropriated by Congress for that purpose shall permit. And the said commissioners shall make a report annually to the Secretary of the Treasury on the progress of said work.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the exclusive control and management of said canal, and shall have power to establish all needful rules and regulations concerning the use and navigation thereof, and to fix, alter, and modify the rates of toll upon said canals, and shall employ such surveyors, collectors, and agents as may be necessary to collect said tolls.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That said commissioners shall have power to employ such surveyors, agents, and other persons as they may judge necessary to perform the work hereby committed to them, with full power to enter upon, appropriate, use, and condemn any lands, waters, streams, and materials of any description necessary for the prosecution of the improvement contemplated by this bill: Provided, That when private property shall be taken for such purpose, the same shall be condemned and compensation made therefor in the manner provided by the laws of the State of Iowa, or of the State of Illinois, as the case may be. And it shall be the duty of said commissioners to cause all the work done upon said canals to be let to the lowest responsible bidder, at public lettings, of which sufficient public notice by advertisement in the public newspapers shall be given.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the revenues derived from said canal, over and above the expenses of management and of repairs, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and a separate account shall be kept of such receipts.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Government of the United States shall issue the sum of $2,000,000 in bonds of the United States, to be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, redeemable twenty years from date, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, for the purpose of constructing said canals; the said interest to be payable, and the said bonds to be redeemable, out of moneys to be hereafter appropriated by Congress; and the said principal and interest to be reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States from the tolls and revenues of said canals.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the said bonds shall be issued, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, in such sums as may be required from time to time in the prosecution of said work. And said commissioners shall furnish vouchers and proofs in duplicate of the work done and materials furnished, at such times, under such regulations, as the said Secretary may prescribe.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That said commissioners shall each receive such salary, not exceeding $2,500, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall, with respect to their respective duties and services, determine. And said commissioners shall respectively give bonds for the faithful performance of their duties, in such amounts and upon such conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Their duties shall cease upon the completion of said canal.

Mr. ALLISON. I now demand, in accordance with my understanding with the gentleman from Illinois, the previous question upon the bill and pending amendments.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman to allow me to take from the Speaker's table the deficiency bill, returned from the Senate with an amendment, in order to non-concur, and ask a committee of conference.

Mr. ARNOLD. I will yield for that purpose, if it leads to no debate.

Mr. STEVENS. If any objection is made to it I will withdraw my application.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to taking up the bill? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose it is in order to move to concur in the Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman makes that motion the Chair will entertain it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make that motion.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I shall have to withdraw my motion. We have voted already upon this question three or four times. I think the bill had better go to a committee of conference and we can get through with it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object unless I can make the motion that the House concur.

PENSIONS.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, bill of the Senate No. 365, an act in relation to pensions, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ILLINOIS SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I rise to a point of order. At the time when this bill was postponed at the former session of Congress it was postponed under an understanding that there was to be a discussion on the merits of the bill. I know that my own name was down on the Speaker's list as one of those who were to speak on this subject. When the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ARNOLD,] pending the Niagara canal bill, offered his amendment, it was understood that I should not speak on the subject then unless that amendment was actually accepted, and then I was to speak upon the merits of the bill. I insist that this bill, having been set down for a particular time, with the understanding to which I allude, it cannot now be taken up and passed under the previous question, thus refusing to those who are opposed to it all chance of pointing out the gross corruptions that exist in its provisions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can scarcely regard that as a point of order upon which he can rule. It may be an argument to the majority of the House not to second the previous question. But the motion for the previous question is a legitimate motion, and unless there be unanimous consent reserving to some gentleman the right to speak, the Chair cannot refuse to entertain the motion.

Mr. ARNOLD. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that after the previous question has been sustained I will yield him the floor to speak at least half an hour, and I presume that I shall not desire to make any reply.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. That half hour is certainly better than nothing; but this is a measure involving an appropriation of unnumbered millions of dollars, as I propose to show.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, the previous question having been demanded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the regular order of business.

Tellers were ordered on seconding the demand for the previous question; and Messrs. ARNOLD, and BROWN of Wisconsin, were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 41.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ARNOLD,] who is entitled to one hour, under the rules, to close the debate, proposes to yield half of that time to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ARNOLD. I yield to the gentleman for half an hour.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Mark Tapley, according to Dickens, upon a certain occasion stated that he had lost the power of being astonished; and I must confess that since I have been in this House I have seen so many odd things happen, that so far as any measure which recklessly plunges us into debt is concerned, I too have lost the power of being astonished at the action of the House.

We have heard gentlemen upon the other side of the House urging taxation. We have seen the call echoed and reechoed from partisan newspaper to partisan newspaper, "tax, tax." We have been told that our people, whose shoulders are bowing under the weight of taxation, must bend still further, because the very life of the nation is in danger, and that the money which they earn by their toil and labor and sweat is needed to sustain us in this war in which our existence as a nation is at stake. And now these gentlemen, who in the way of taxation are turning the screws upon the people, these gentlemen (who, even after we have overburdened labor until it can scarcely stand up under the weight, are clamoring still further for taxation) ask us to enter into a scheme of internal improvements, whose results, whether they be beneficial or no, can never be realized for the next five years; they ask us to enter into such a system, and to squander the credit of the Government and the money of the people in favor of local interests.

But during the entire session I have seen nothing that more completely illustrates the strange temper of the times than does the proposition now before the House. In the very magnitude of the sums which we are daily voting, in the enormous extent of expenditure demanded by our exhausting civil war, the minds of our citizens seem to have been mazed, and the ordinary power of arithmetical calculation to be lost.

Gentlemen seem not to remember that we have a national indebtedness already ascertained of over $1,700,000,000; that our bonds payable in gold are at a discount in the market, as compared with gold, of over fifty per cent.; that our legal-tender notes, which we force citizens to take in lieu of money, are at a like discount; that to an untold extent we have State, county, and municipal indebtedness created to aid enlistments; and that an annual expenditure of over $700,000,000 is required to carry on the war. Yawning before us is that abyss of national bankruptcy, from whose depths, when once precipitated there, no nation ever escapes. Wise men are pondering over the means of avoiding such catastrophe, patriots are contributing of their substance, women are giving the labor of their hands, and children are presenting their offerings, in aid of the struggling country.

Mr. Speaker, from the explanations which I have heard here, I do not think that gentlemen of this House fully understand what is proposed by this bill. In the first place, it provides that the President shall or may construct this canal drawing six feet of water. It then provides that we appropriate $5,000,000, which the President may give for the purposes of this canal if the State of Illinois shall assume, at her own expense, to complete the canal so that gunboats drawing six feet can pass through its entire length.

Now, the first difficulty that meets us is this: that in the constitution of the State of Illinois there is a provision by which she cannot contract a debt beyond $50,000, and consequently that portion of this bill amounts to nothing. It is a bill to appropriate $5,000,000 to this canal for the purpose of enabling gunboats, which could not live for a single hour on Lake Michigan, to pass over it. The first part of the bill is the only part of it upon which gentlemen who sustain it can rely. That part of the bill pledges the credit of this country to an unlimited extent for the completion of an enterprise which I shall endeavor to show is utterly impossible and impracticable through the obstacles which nature has placed in its way.

By the bill the President has the power to proceed at once and let contracts to complete this work, no matter what it costs, five, ten, fifty, a hundred millions, or even an amount greater than the debt which is now weighing upon the country. I propose to show that no five or ten or twenty or forty or even sixty million dollars will be sufficient to complete this work. And I propose to prove that from a work which was drawn up for the purpose of showing how the city of Chicago could be benefited by the completion of a portion only of the canal. I hold in my hand the report of the sewerage commission of Chicago. For the purpose of ascertaining how cheaply the city might by this means have drainage, they commissioned the chief engineer to ascertain and make an estimate of the cost. Now, sir, the object which they wished to accomplish was simply the enlarging and deepening of the canal from Chicago to Peru, the easiest, the slightest, the most unimportant portion of the work, so far as the public is concerned. For the purpose, then, of showing the cost of this work, according to the estimate of their own engineer, I will ask the Clerk to read the portion of that report which I have marked.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Two other projects have been talked of for enlarging the canal, so as to make it navigable for steamboats; one with a channel two hundred feet wide and six feet deep, and the other with a channel of the same width, but twelve and a half feet deep.

"The probable cost of constructing the former of these has been estimated by Mr. Gooding at $10,000,000, and of the latter at $20,000,000; but of course he does not consider those sums as anything more than a rude approximation, and they are not intended to include the probable cost of locks and other necessary works at and below Lockport.

"There does not appear to be reasonable probability of an enlarged canal, either six or twelve and a half feet deep, being undertaken at present or very soon; but the demands of the city and State for greater facilities of transporting the grain, lumber, and other products of this region a generation hence, if the future development of our country is to be at all in proportion to the past, must eventually cause such a work to be commenced."

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. From this, Mr. Speaker, the House will perceive that the estimate for this small portion of the work was $10,000,000, provided the canal should be only six feet deep; which for all purposes of commercial enterprise, which, as the gentleman claims, gives this scheme its value, is utterly worthless. And it was $20,000,000 if the canal should be made twelve feet deep, deep enough to allow the passage of boats that can ride the waters of Lake Michigan. Such is the estimate of their own engineer of that unimportant portion of this work.

And we find further that in the year 1860 the sewerage commission of Chicago, anxious for this work, and desiring to rid that city of the nuisances, attendant upon inefficient drainage, pronounced this to be an enterprise not now to be contemplated, but which might perhaps be called for in another generation. Alas! the flight of four years has almost created another generation. Where is now that respect for constitutional laws; the desire to limit the expenditure of the money of the people; the desire to relieve the producing classes of the enormous public burdens? Gentlemen now present to this House a proposition which five years ago, ay, a little over four years ago, in 1860, would have aroused the country from one end to the other; and now, as a part of the current expenditures of the Government, during a time when we need every dollar of the treasure of the United States, they propose to throw away this amount of money.

What will it cost to carry out this scheme? The distance of the work on the Illinois and Des Plaines rivers is, I think, more than one hundred and fifty, if not two hundred miles. If I am wrong in my recollection, gentlemen will correct me. That entire distance is to be rendered navigable at all seasons of the year. Even if the permanent improvement of the Illinois river as proposed is a possible thing, (and I shall give my reasons for thinking it extremely difficult,) the excess of cost may be many times greater than $10,000,000. The construction of the canal from Chicago to the Illinois river is an expensive undertaking, but can doubtless be accomplished; and any experienced engineer, making allowance for the increased cost of materials and labor, and ascertaining the value of land to be taken, can give an approximate estimate of the cost. But the chief difficulty arises with the Illinois river. Running almost the entire length of the State, it drains nearly all the prairies of Illinois; the depth of its waters, therefore, vary from a few inches in dry seasons to from ten to twenty feet in wet, rainy seasons; the banks are low and almost entirely alluvial, except for the few miles near the Mississippi river; and with the last exception, in high stages of water it overflows its banks and widens almost to a lake. The bars impeding navigation in one sense, but, damming up the water and preventing its rapid flow, aiding navigation in another sense, are naturally shifting; each new torrent that swells the river changes them. If the river were always to remain at its lowest stage, the task of removing bars and constructing enormous locks not less than three hundred and fifty feet in length would be an expensive but still a simple operation. These, however, would be swept out of existence in the higher stages of water. In the East, with your rocky river bottoms and banks, presenting a solid mass against and on which dams and other water obstructions may be constructed, the science of water-courses is a simple one; give your works strength enough and it will stand.

But this is not true on the alluvial and gravel bottoms of the West. Even in the simple operation of constructing dams for milling purposes the greatest difficulty is experienced. The water works under the dam, it carries away the bank on which the dam abuts, and in many ways not common in streams with a rocky foundation it destroys and removes the impediment to its course. Dams constructed of the trees and underbrush have been found the most effective; but even on ordinary streams they are not altogether safe. Nearly every river of the West shows in its course that slight obstructions have been sufficient altogether to change its channel and induce it to break through its feeble barrier of light earth confining it and seek a new route. Now let us suppose that you have removed old sand-bars and constructed locks at various points along the line of the river; this will be well enough until the flood comes. But when the torrent gathers from all parts of Illinois, rushes along the course of the river, covering with its waters, not the river banks only, but the locks which you have made, what will become of your slight creations? Lock after lock will give way, and the temporary obstacles will only enable the flood to bear additional ruin and disaster in its course. Then the damage must be paid for, new sand-bars must be removed, and new locks built to share the same fate at the next season.

And here I would call the attention of the House to the enormous damage that must be done from the causes described to the property along the banks of the river; and for this damage the United States would be liable to pay. The honorable gentleman from Illinois has not proposed to indemnify the Government against this. Any one of ordinary practical knowledge will at once appreciate the force of the facts alluded to. And the advocates of this bill are precluded from denying the conclusions, because, had they not themselves so believed, their first step would have been to have asked a preliminary survey by Government engineers, whose standing would be too high to admit the idea of their being influenced to make a false report. No State government, no private corporation, no other Government of any kind on the face of the earth—as I believe—even when having money to squander, ever entered upon an enterprise of this kind without a preliminary survey by engineers responsible to the party which must advance the money. If in his private business any man should so act, he would be deprived of all power over his property by a commission for lunacy or imbecility; yet here honorable members would vote away the heritage of the nation, having no excuse save politics and contracts.

But as the thirty minutes allowed to me are not sufficient for full description, I must hasten on to another point. By the original bill it is proposed that the Government should give $13,000,000 to this work, and be reimbursed by toll. The idea embraced in this bill, and urged upon the House, is, that if the Government constructs this work, it shall be repaid for its outlay by the tolls collected. I see some Representatives from Illinois, some Democrats, who in olden times paid some little respect to constitutional law, and who now propose to support this measure.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he maintains that there is no constitutional power to pass this bill.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I was coming to that point. I believe that there can be no greater abuse on the part of the Government of its power to expend the money of the people than to devote the money wrong from the people of one portion of the country to the local benefit of another portion.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. Is that a question of constitutional power?

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. If the gentleman had waited a moment, he would not have found it necessary to question me on this point. The gentleman has heard of such an instrument as the Ordinance of 1787 by which that whole northwestern territory was organized. He has heard of the provision of that ordinance under which all the highways leading into the Mississippi and the St. Lawrence were to be free; and, as if anticipating that at some future time some legislative body might attempt such legislation as this, the framers of that act have in section four of that ordinance (Illinois Revised Statutes of 1858, page 24) provided that—

"The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence shall be common highways and forever free as well to the inhabitants of the United States as those of the territory and of the several States to be thereafter admitted, without tax, impost, or duty."

This ordinance, as a form of government, was superseded by the State constitutions, (as the Supreme Court correctly decided;) but all rights acquired under the ordinance remain intact. And from abundance of caution this principle was confirmed by the act of Congress providing for the admission of Illinois into the Union, (same, page 1, section 4, of act of 1818,) and by express reference to the Ordinance of 1787 in the preamble to the constitution of that State; and, again, by the resolution of Congress of December 3, 1818, admitting Illinois into the Union. Similar precautions have been taken in regard to all, or nearly all, the States formed from the north west territory. As no compact can be changed without the consent of all parties to it, in order to be enabled to levy tolls upon the Illinois river, you must not only have an act of Congress, but must change the constitution of Illinois, and have the consent as well of each purchaser of lands on the banks of the river as of the various other States formed from that territory; this compact was between the United States and each of the northwest States, as it was admitted, and extended to all the waters of the territory. The United States cannot, therefore, collect tolls on that river either from the construction or maintenance of locks. So far from that, each person actually impeded in the navigation of the river by locks, could remove them, and claim compensation for loss and detention.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word? If I understood him correctly, he stated that the first obstacle to the execution of this enterprise is a provision in the constitution of the State of Illinois which provides that the Legislature of that State shall not make any appropriation or contract any debt for a sum exceeding $50,000. I think the gentleman is incorrect in that statement, and I ask him to have read the thirty-seventh section of the third article of the constitution of Illinois, if that is the section to which he refers.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I have it here. I looked over it a moment ago; and the very next section provides that the State of Illinois shall not lend its credit to any individual, association, or corporation. The two sections go together.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman allow those two sections to be read for the information of the House?

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. If the time consumed in reading is not to come out of my time, I consent.

Several MEMBERS. It shall not.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"SEC. 37. Each General Assembly shall provide for all the appropriations necessary for the ordinary and contingent expenses of the government until the adjournment of the next regular session, the aggregate amount of which shall not be increased without a vote of two thirds of each House, nor exceed the amount of revenue authorized by law to be raised in such time: Provided, The State may, to meet casual deficits or failures in revenues, contract debts never to exceed in the aggregate $50,000; and the moneys thus borrowed shall be applied to the purpose for which they were obtained, or to repay the debt thus made, and to no other purpose; and no other debt except for the purpose of repelling invasion, suppressing insurrection, or defending the State in war, (for payment of which the faith of the State shall be pledged,) shall be contracted, unless the law authorizing the same shall, at a general election, have been submitted to the people, and have received a majority of all the votes cast for members of the General Assembly at such election. The General Assembly shall provide for the publication of said law for three months at least before the vote of the people shall be taken upon the same; and provision shall be made, at the time, for the payment of the interest annually, as it shall accrue, by a tax levied for the purpose, or from other sources of revenue; which law, providing for the payment of such interest by such tax, shall be irrevocable until such debt be paid: And provided further, That the law levying the tax shall be submitted to the people with the law authorizing the debt to be contracted.

"Sec. 38. The credit of the State shall not, in any manner, be given to, or in aid of, any individual, association, or corporation."

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, if I understand the gentleman's point in answer to me, it is that they may draft a law and submit it to the people, by which the people may assume that debt, providing in the law for the payment of the interest and principal. If the gentleman had been contented to accept that provision, and that alone, they might perhaps have had some reason in saying that they assume this risk of such action by the people. But the difficulty is that they commence with authorizing the President at any cost to make the proposed improvement. We all know that the people of Illinois could never consent to tax themselves to an amount which is necessary in order to complete this improvement, so that gentlemen use that only to attract the attention of the House, relying in fact upon the first provision.

Mr. INGERSOLL rose.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will allow me, as my time is brief, I will go on without further interruption. If it does not come out of my thirty minutes I shall be happy to be interrupted as often as gentlemen please.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want to correct the gentleman, and I presume that he does not desire to be in error. There is a provision in the bill under consideration that this act shall not take effect, even with the vote of the House and the Senate and the approval of the President of the United States, until Illinois has complied with the condition of the contract on its part.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Then I say that if there is such a provision, I think that we ought to reject the bill, because it is not drawn in a manner to express ideas. If the State of Illinois is to do the work, and that alone is what you seek, why do you put it in the power of the President of the United States to do it? Why do you require him to go on and contract? The limitation the gentleman speaks of is a limitation to Illinois of $5,000,000, and not a limitation of the power of the President of the United States.

Mr. INGERSOLL rose.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I cannot be interrupted any further. When the gentleman interrupted me before I was not touching a kindred subject; I was showing that we could get in no shape any remuneration from that long canal, because the Ordinance of the Northwest, ratified between the Government and every State of the Northwest, made these highways free from imposition or toll.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the gentleman will allow me. The gentleman has no objection to the President to construct this improvement without an appropriation of five or six million dollars. On that point I think he will have no objection to the bill. I think the issue is whether we will pass the bill or not.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. It may appear to the gentleman that there is no objection to authorizing the President to make a contract involving millions and millions. Does he think that the country will hold back from the contractors the reward of their labor? I say that when we authorize the President to construct that work we give him every power necessary. If I authorize my agent to build a house he has the power to bind me to every extent necessary to accomplish that object. So with the President. And this may cost, as I believe it will, hundreds of millions of dollars. If after Congress pass this bill it should refuse to appropriate the money, it would be a breach of faith, which I hope no man here will be guilty of.

Now for the commercial advantages. I have shown that a small portion of the cost of this canal, twelve feet deep, was to be $20,000,000. If we take it six feet deep, which, I believe, is the provision of this bill, then it will be $10,000,000. What is a canal six feet deep worth for the purposes of intercourse between the Mississippi and Lake Michigan? I do not know how many members of the House have ever been on Lake Michigan, but I can speak from experience as having been on that lake and on the ocean and on the Mississippi. The ordinary navigation of the Mississippi river is with light-draught boats, drawing often not more than ten, twelve, or fifteen inches, though sometimes as high as two feet. I know what Lake Michigan is, and I tell gentlemen who have not been there that you want stronger and better sea-going boats for that lake than you do for the navigation of the ocean; and I will give the reason for it. Upon the ocean, where you have sea-room, you give way to the storm, and the effect of not opposing it diminishes the danger. But on Lake Michigan, where you have narrow sea-room, you must turn and tack from point to point, and resist the force of the waves, and on that account the strain is greater upon the vessel, and therefore stronger vessels are needed than upon the Atlantic ocean. Let me ask gentlemen if they would intrust themselves upon the Atlantic ocean in a vessel drawing only six feet of water?

But more than that: suppose you have a canal of the depth of twelve feet, to obviate these difficulties; your vessel from Lake Michigan, which is to pass over this canal, will draw six, seven, eight, or nine feet, and though it might get through the canal, it could not navigate the Mississippi. I presume that many of you, and I know that the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] who is an advocate of this measure, has gone up the Mississippi in boats drawing but a few inches, and has been compelled to lie hours and days upon bars in the river. What, then, is the use of getting into the Mississippi river with boats of six and eight feet draught, when you cannot use them when you get them there?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ARNOLD. I shall not occupy the time of the House in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I will simply say that he resides in the town of Milwaukee, formerly the rival of Chicago.

Mr. COX. Will not the gentleman from Illinois allow my friend from Wisconsin ten minutes further time?

Mr. ARNOLD. I think I have been very liberal, as I have allowed the gentleman more than half my time.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Let me appeal to the gentleman for a moment. He will recollect—

Mr. ARNOLD. Gentlemen upon this side of the House desire to speak, otherwise I should be glad to hear the eloquent gentleman further. I listened to the gentleman's appeal, and granted him more than half my time.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. The gentleman certainly is not afraid that I shall move him against his own reason. I ask him to recollect that when this amendment was before the House, attached to another bill, by an understanding with him I did not speak against that amendment, and there was an understanding that I should have a chance to speak here.

Mr. ARNOLD. I think I have discharged my agreement. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. ALLISON. It is not my purpose to make any remarks upon the original proposition before the House, but only to present a few reasons to the House why I believe the amendment I had the honor to present a few moments ago should be adopted. The proposition contained in that amendment is simply to improve what are called the Upper and Lower rapids of the Mississippi—the Lower one at Keokuk, Iowa, two hundred miles above St. Louis; and the Upper rapids two hundred miles further up the river.

The substance of my amendment has received the sanction of the Committee on Roads and Canals, the proposition having been before the committee during the last session of the present Congress. The amendment proposes the issuing of $2,000,000 in bonds for the purpose of completing these two canals around these rapids. According to the careful estimates of competent engineers, I think that sum will be very nearly if not quite sufficient to complete both of those works and place them in such a position that vessels that can navigate the Mississippi during that season of the year can pass also around those rapids. It is not the purpose of this proposition to take any money out of the Treasury of the United States, nor will the effect of the proposition be such, if it is adopted.

We only propose to use the credit of the Government for the purpose of building these canals, and the tolls that are to be received by the Government itself will be amply sufficient, as I believe, to pay the interest upon that loan, and also pay the principal at maturity.

We have an example in the Ohio river which is sufficient to give us very reliable data as to what the effect of the improvement of the Mississippi river would be. The Louisville and Portland canal, which is in the district of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MALLOY,] has proved to be a paying investment to that company. That canal company was organized by the Legislature of Kentucky as early as 1826, and the canal was completed in 1831. During the period of twelve years, from 1831 to 1842, that canal paid dividends to the stockholders (the Government being a large stockholder in the canal) varying from six to ten per cent. per annum. The profits of the company were so large that the Legislature of the State of Kentucky at that time passed a bill amending the charter of the company, and authorizing the individual stockholders to sell their stock at $150 for every $100 subscribed, and within twelve years from the time that that bill was passed by the Legislature of Kentucky and was accepted by the company, every dollar of the stock, excepting that owned by the Government of the United States and a few shares to preserve the organization, was redeemed at one dollar and fifty cents for every dollar. The tolls received by the company were then reduced to twenty-five cents per ton, and since that time the net tolls on that canal have been about one hundred thousand dollars per annum. They are now enlarging it, and for that purpose have obtained a loan for $1,600,000, and I hold in my hand a letter from Hon. James Guthrie, of Louisville, in which he says that they expect that the tolls on the canal, at the rate of twenty-five cents per ton, will pay, within a period of twenty years, that entire loan, and also pay for the repairs necessary to keep up the canal. We had requested him to furnish us information with reference to the Louisville and Portland canal, and in this same letter he states that he believes canals built around the Lower and Upper rapids of the Mississippi river would prove not only profitable to the Government, but to any company that might organize for the purpose of constructing them.

Now, the object of these two canals around those rapids of the Mississippi is, first, to enable us to reach the canal passing through the State of Illinois from Alton and St. Louis to Chicago. I can say to the gentleman from Illinois who has presented this question to the House that his proposition will be of no value whatever to the Northwest unless he accompanies it with a project to improve the rapids of the Mississippi. The great States of Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and a portion of Illinois, will virtually be deprived of any benefit from this canal unless you also enable them to reach the canal at St. Louis by improving the rapids, which cannot now be navigated by vessels of any class for four months of the season of navigation. Not only that, but an improvement of the rapids of the Mississippi will enable vessels to leave Pittsburg and pass around to the city of St. Paul, nine hundred miles above St. Louis, without changing bulk. They cannot do it now, because during five months of the eight months of the season of navigation the navigation of the river above Keokuk is almost useless.

Now, I ask gentlemen who represent the great eastern States to aid us in reaching the great railroads which lead to the East by means of these water communications extending from St. Paul to St. Louis, and thence by Cairo and the Ohio river to Pittsburg. By so doing the people of the States of Minnesota, and Iowa, and Wisconsin, and of a large portion of Illinois, may receive some advantages from the main proposition now before the House should it become a law. But without that the Illinois canal will be of no practical benefit whatever to the people of those great northwestern States.

I will not, during the ten minutes allotted to me by the courtesy of the honorable member from Illinois, [Mr. ARNOLD,] undertake to argue the necessity of the adoption of this amendment to the uninterrupted navigation of this great national highway from St. Paul to the Gulf of Mexico when trade with the southern States is resumed, and when western produce will again seek a southern market.

I have no desire to detain the House further. I trust my amendment will be adopted and made a part of the bill.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, I have but a word to say on the proposition now before the House. First, in regard to the ability of the proposed canal to take through to the lakes the vessels of war constructed for the Mississippi—the best vessels owned by the Government, and which did such essential service in taking the fortifications at Mobile. I have the authority of the gentleman who constructed those vessels that they can be taken through the canal as proposed.

In reply to the objection made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. Brown,] that there is no security that this appropriation will result in the completion of the canal, I have this to say: that, by the provisions of the bill, before the bonds are delivered to the State of Illinois, that State, in a legal and constitutional way, is to undertake and contract with the General Government that, for this $5,000,000, the work shall be completed in the manner provided for by law. That is to be a solemn contract between the State of Illinois and the Federal Government.

I will not detain the House longer, and will ask that the vote be taken on the bill and amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the whole subject be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. ALLISON and DAWSON.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 73.

So the House refused to lay the whole subject on the table.

The question was first taken on Mr. ALLISON's amendment to the amendment, and it was adopted.

The question was next taken on Mr. ARNOLD's amendment as amended, and it was adopted.

The bill was then engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. ARNOLD moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 68, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eden, Eldridge, Elliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call, Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri, stated that Mr. Rogers was absent on account of illness.

Mr. ARNOLD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays on the latter motion; and called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ELDRIDGE and ALLISON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 63, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Anderson, Arnold, Bailly, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eden, Elliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Cox, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Denison, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Hooper, Hotchkiss, William Johnson, Knapp, Lazear, Littlejohn, Marcy, McAllister, Melndoe, Middleton, Moorhead, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Odell, Pike, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Starr, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Srouse, Sweat, Thayer, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Ward, Webster, and Chilton A. White—42.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

During the roll-call, Mr. ODELL stated that he was paired off with his colleague, Mr. WARD.

Mr. PIKE, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Mr. ALLISON objected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution directing the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to inquire into the origin of the fire in the Smithsonian Institution, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the House will allow me to take from the table the deficiency bill for the purpose of moving a non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate and asking for a committee of conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object unless I am permitted to move that the House concur in that amendment of the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose that there will be no objection to the gentleman making that motion. But I desire to move that the House non-concur in the amendment, and ask for a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. The first question will be upon the motion to concur in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the amendment in full.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the second section of said bill.

The section was read, as follows:

Be it further enacted, That $38,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to be added to the contingent fund of the House, to enable the House of Representatives to fulfill the pledge and obligation heretofore made, and the same shall be audited and settled on such vouchers as shall be produced by the Clerk of the House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. In case the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is voted down, will it then be in order to move that the House adhere?

The SPEAKER. It will not be in order. If the motion that the House concur is voted down, the next question will be upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] that the House insist upon its disagreement, and ask the appointment of a committee of conference.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to ask an explanation from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. STEVENS] of some things connected with our appropriations.

No objection was made.

Mr. SCHENCK. My attention has been directed to this deficiency bill, which seems to stand now upon a question of public virtue and economy between the Senate and the House, and I have been struck with some two or three items in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill which passed this House on the 19th of last month. I find that while there are fifty-two Senators, and one hundred and eighty-nine members and Delegates in this House, there has been appropriated for the compensation and mileage of those fifty-two Senators the sum of $247,430; for the mileage and compensation of the one hundred and eighty-nine members and Delegates the sum of $300,000. Now, by law the compensation and mileage of a member of this House are the same as for a Senator. Now, I do not understand this matter, and would like to have it explained.

Again, looking to the incidental expenses, I find that the allowance made to the Senate for newspapers is $3,000, while the allowance to the House is $1,000; being three times as much for fifty-two Senators as it is for one hundred and eighty-nine members and Delegates.

Again, I observe that the Senate stationery is set down at $17,000, while the stationery for the House is set down at $12,000. This may be accounted for by the fact that they have no limitation in the Senate upon the amount of stationery to be taken. However that may be, it seems that fifty-two men in the Senate are supposed to consume $17,000 worth of stationery in their correspondence, while one hundred and eighty-nine members and Delegates in this House consume only $12,000. Then for the Congressional Globe the Senate is allowed $35,000; the House is allowed $29,400, while one hundred copies of the Globe for the House are for the library of the House.

These are some of the discrepancies which are apparent, arising out of the question of relative economy between the two Houses. And as long as we have the question before us I would like to have these discrepancies explained.

Mr. STEVENS. The first discrepancy, in regard to the appropriations for the compensation and mileage of Congress, can be accounted for in part by the fact that there was an excess from last year's appropriation for the House. In regard to the other discrepancies, in relation to incidental expenses for the two Houses, I would state that the matter in regard to stationery and newspapers is to be accounted for only in this way: when the clerks and the Secretary of the Senate make up their accounts for the stationery, &c., of the Senate, the Committee on Finance do not presume to scrutinize them, but take those accounts as correct. But in the case of the House, when our clerks make up their accounts as they have done, the Senate become furious and say that we shall not have them allowed. Members of the Senate maintain that that body has never since 1858 authorized any such expenditure as this out of its contingent fund. Now, sir, as controverting this position, I desire to state that in the act of March 3, 1863, to provide for sundry civil expenses, the following section, having originated in the Senate, was agreed to by the House:

"Sec. 15. That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay out of the contingent fund for such extra messengers, pages, laborers, and services for the Senate during the present session as the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate may approve and direct."

I hope the vote will now be taken, and that we shall insist on our disagreement.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman's attention to one fact. I understand from the Secretary of War that at the present time not a single dollar can be expended from his Department for the sick and wounded soldiers in our hospitals because of the delay in the passage of this bill.

Mr. STEVENS. So far as that subject is concerned, I look upon the action of the Senate as an atrocities. If the sick and wounded soldiers are not provided for the blame should justly rest with the Senate. But I take it for granted that this House, after what has been done, will never consent to abandon its determination to adhere to the item which the Senate now proposes to strike out.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to concur in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and PENDLETON, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 25, noes 84.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 47, nays 83, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brounall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Grinnell, Harding, Harrington, Higby, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburt, Julian, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Lonn, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Norton, Perham, Pike, Price, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Worthington—47.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Ashley, Blow, Boyd, James S. Brown, Clay, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deining, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Edgerton, Eldridge, Elliot, Farnsworth, Finck, Ganson, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jeneckes, Philip Johnson, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Knapp, Knox, Law, Le Blond, Long, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Pomroy, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Scott, Shannon, Smithers, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Townsend, Van Valkenburgh, Whaley, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—83.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnold, Blair, Bliss, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Denison, Donnelly, Eden, English, Frank, Gouch, Hale, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Lazear, Littlejohn, Mulory, Marcy, McAllister, McIndoe, Middleton, Moorhead, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Patterson, Perry, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Starr, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, and Chilton A. White—52.

So the House refused to concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The question recurring on the motion that the House insist on its disagreement and ask a committee of conference, it was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I had intended to ask that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the naval appropriation bill, but the hour is late. I therefore make a motion, to which I suppose there will be no objection, that we proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

VENTILATING HALLS OF CONGRESS.

The concurrent resolution of the Senate relative to the ventilation and improvement of the Halls of Congress was taken from the Speaker's table, and, on motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

FIRE AT SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the Senate:

IN SENATE UNITED STATES, February 2, 1865.

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, conjointly with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House, be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire into the origin of the fire by which the Smithsonian Institution building and the valuable deposits therein were, on Tuesday, the 24th day of January, in whole or in part destroyed; the approximate loss to the Government and to private persons; the means necessary to preserve the remaining portions of said building and its contents from further injury; and such other facts in connection therewith as may be of public interest, and to report by bill or otherwise.

The concurrent resolution was passed.

ASYLUM FOR INSANE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 644, to extend to certain persons in the employ of the Government the benefits of the Asylum for Insane in the District of Columbia, as follows:

Insert: "During the continuance of the rebellion."

The amendment was concurred in.

ACTING ASSISTANT TREASURERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 689, to provide for Acting Assistant Treasurers or depositaries of the United States in certain cases.

Mr. STEVENS moved that they be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House an amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 621, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, I will make a statement and then make a motion. The House made an amendment to the West Point appropriation bill, as it came from the Committee of Ways and Means, repealing the law of the last year, which took away from the President and Secretary of War the power to send back a cadet who was dismissed from West Point under any circumstances unless the cadet could have the recommendation of the academic board. The House repealed that provision in the West Point Academy appropriation bill, leaving it where it has been ever since the foundation of West Point. The Senate disagree to that repeal. I move to insist on the amendment, and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. McBRIDE moved to concur.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The motion to concur was disagreed to.

Mr. BLAINE's motion was then agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISQUALIFICATION OF COLOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bill No. 62, to remove all disqualification of color in carrying the mail; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ALLEY moved that the bill be put on its passage.

Mr. ROSS moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The bill, which was read, provides that hereafter no person by reason of color shall be disqualified from employment in carrying the mails, and that all acts and parts of acts establishing such disqualification, especially the seventh section of the act of March 3, 1825, shall be repealed.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I will merely state that this is the repeal of an old law for which repeal petitions have been sent from all parts of the country. It has passed the Senate almost unanimously, and was considered by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads informally, and agreed to, and I was directed, as its chairman, to move that it be put on its passage when it was reached.

Mr. FINCK. I want to state, as one member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, that the bill did not receive my concurrence.

Mr. ALLEY. I did not say that it had received the unanimous concurrence of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I now demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 15; no quorum voting.

Mr. STILES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

There being, on a division on the question—ayes 46, noes 49.

Mr. ANCONA called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ANCONA and Mr. ALLEY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 46.

So the motion was agreed to.

And thereupon (at four o'clock and twenty minutes, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 3, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The message also announced that the House non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 621) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, insisted on its non-concurrence, and asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and appointed Messrs. J. G. BLAINE of Maine, R. MALLORY of Kentucky, and G. S. ORTH of Indiana, managers on its part.

The message also announced that the House non-concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 709) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, insisted on its non-concurrence, and asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Messrs. T. STEVENS of Pennsylvania, G. H. PENDLETON of Ohio, and J. S. MORRILL of Vermont, managers at the conference on its part.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of January 12, 1865, a statement of the amounts paid by that Department for attorney and counsel fees during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, and from that period to January 1, 1865.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I believe there are now responses from all the Secretaries to that resolution, but I am not quite sure.

Mr. GRIMES. Is there one from the Attorney General?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am not certain whether there is or not. I desire to move to print all these communications as soon as there are responses from all the heads of Departments.

Mr. GRIMES. Was the Attorney General included in the resolution?

Mr. TRUMBULL. He was included in the resolution. If they are not all in, I move that this communication lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 728) to pay to each of the surviving soldiers of the Revolution, five in number, whose names are on the pension rolls, $300 annually as a gratuity, in addition to the pension now allowed them, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

NIAGARA FALLS CANAL.

The bill (H. R. No. 126) to construct a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest that the bill should go to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is subject to any motion.

Mr. MORRILL. I make the motion that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Such measures have heretofore gone to the Committee on Military Affairs. They have always had charge of the subject, and I think this bill had better take the usual course.

Mr. MORRILL. Is it a military measure?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; it is a military measure, for the purpose of military protection.

Mr. GRIMES. If it should go to any committee other than the Committee on Commerce, it ought to be the Committee on Naval Affairs, I submit, for the bill is to construct a canal, and if it is for military purposes it is for the transportation of vessels from one lake to another through a canal.

Mr. MORRILL. The title of the bill is to construct a ship-canal.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no doubt it ought to go to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am not particular as to the direction the bill shall take. It is not, however, a new question in the Senate. Our Committee on Military Affairs have had it under consideration and I think have a bill now pending before them on this very subject, and they have once made a report upon the question. A part of this subject is there now, not this precise bill, but a bill very similar to it; and that being the case, I thought the whole subject had best go to that committee together. If the Committee on Commerce desires to take jurisdiction on it, it would be better to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the consideration of the bill which they already have, and upon which they have taken action.

Mr. MORRILL. It strikes me that the measure should stand on much higher grounds than that. If this was a matter of defense growing out of the necessity of the war, I could understand why it should go to the Committee on Military Affairs, but upon no other grounds whatever. If it is a matter affecting the commerce of the country, it should go to the Committee on Commerce. Unless it is a question where an obvious military necessity of the country requires that the measure should be entered upon at this time, I submit that it is not a question for the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The measure undoubtedly partakes of both characters. It is of the highest commercial importance that these canals should be constructed, but I do not think the measure stands entirely upon commercial grounds. It is also of very great importance in a military point of view for the defense of the northern frontier. I am not sure what committee reported it in the other House; perhaps they had a special committee on the subject; but in this body, heretofore, it has always been taken charge of by the Committee on Military Affairs, at least for two sessions to my knowledge, and a report was once made by that committee. It seems to me that the committee which has been investigating the subject and has it under consideration at this time is the proper committee to take charge of the whole subject, and that is the reason why I think this bill should go to the Military Committee. Although the measure partakes of a commercial character, and it might be very proper to give it in charge to the Committee on Commerce, it also partakes of a military character, and is put on both grounds.

Mr. MORRILL. I make no allusion to the bill whatever with any positive purpose. I have no opinion as to the character of the bill. I simply make the suggestion. I now withdraw my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER AND LAKE MICHIGAN CANAL.

The bill (H. R. No. 322) to construct a ship-canal for the passage of armed and naval vessels from the Mississippi river to Lake Michigan, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the Senate insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 621) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, and agreed to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The VICE PRESIDENT was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and he appointed Messrs. HOWE, HARRIS, and HENDRICKS.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the Senate insisted on its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 709) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and agreed to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The VICE PRESIDENT was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and he appointed Messrs. CLARK, GRIMES, and RIDDLE.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of J. W. Arnold and several other per diem clerks employed in the Washington navy-yard, who pray that they may be by law created permanent clerks. I believe that such petitions have hitherto been referred to the Committee on Finance at this session, and I therefore move that this petition be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN presented the memorial of Edward McDonald Reynolds, praying that investigation may be made into the causes of his dismissal from the service as captain in the Marine corps; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of military officers in the military service of the United States, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of citizens of Washington city, residents on Maryland avenue, east of the Capitol, praying for the improvement of said avenue between the Capitol and Camp Barry; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to take up a few moments of the time of the Senate in the consideration of Senate bill No. 408.

Mr. COLLAMER. I hope we shall be allowed to make reports from committees.

Mr. WILSON. I have waited for four days to take up this bill, which must be passed in ten days if we are to act upon it at all. It is the bill to amend the enrollment act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Reports from committees are in order.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. COLLAMER, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of the citizens of Youngstown, Ohio, praying that the railroad from Youngstown, Ohio, to Sharon, Pennsylvania, may be declared a mail route, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 413) to establish a certain post road, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 407) to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China, reported it with amendments.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William Harding, praying for compensation for services as a soldier in the war of 1812, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 426) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section nine of the act approved July 17, 1862, entitled 'An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes;'" approved April 9, 1864; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. WILSON. I now renew the motion to take up Senate bill No. 408. I think we can dispose of it in a few moments.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Would that displace the resolution which was under consideration yesterday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I cannot consent to anything which will displace that measure. I am willing that this bill shall be taken up if it does not displace that, and it can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to take up this bill now. I think we can dispose of it before one o'clock. It will take probably but a few moments, and it is of great importance, if it is ever to be acted upon, that it should be acted on at once.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is it?

Mr. WILSON. It is Senate bill No. 408, in addition to the several acts for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes. One or two provisions of it are of very great importance; and as the draft is to take place in the middle of this month, I consider it of much more importance than the question concerning the counting of the Presidential votes. In my opinion, it is of more consequence now to get soldiers than to do anything else, for I understand that what is going on at the present time has stopped enlistments all over the country, and it may be to our disadvantage. I think we had better put ourselves right.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the order of the day can be informally laid aside for the purpose of taking up this bill I will not object.

Mr. WILSON. I agree to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the suggestion?

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the order of the day can be informally laid aside so as not to lose its place I will not object to a temporary interference with it.

Mr. WILSON. I make that motion, that the order of the day be laid aside informally with a view to take up this bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 408) in addition to the several acts for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs have reported the bill with an amendment in the form of a substitute, and therefore I do not think it necessary to read the original bill; and I suggest, unless its reading be called for by some Senator, that the substitute only be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reading of the original bill will be dispensed with if there be no objection, and the amendment only be read. The Chair hears no objection.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

That from and after the passage of this act, any person enrolled and liable to be drafted, may be accepted as a substitute for a drafted person, and such drafted person shall be exempt from service for such time as the substitute shall be held to service under the terms of his enlistment.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no person owing military service shall be exempt from liability to perform the same on account of furnishing a substitute for the Navy, unless the substitute is presented in person to the board of enrollment by which the principal is enrolled, and is accepted by said board of enrollment.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That any recruiting agent, substitute broker, or other person, who shall enlist, or cause to be enlisted, as a volunteer or substitute, any insane person or person in a condition of intoxication, or a deserter from the military or naval service, knowing him to be such, or who shall defraud or deprive any volunteer or substitute of any portion of the State, local, or United States bounty to which he may be entitled, shall, upon conviction by any court-martial or military commission, be fined not exceeding $1,000, or imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of such court-martial or military commission.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any officer who shall muster into the military or naval service of the United States any deserter from said service, or insane person, or person in a condition of intoxication, knowing him to be such, shall, upon conviction by any court martial or military commission, be dishonorably dismissed the service of the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all State and local bounties hereafter to be paid to any volunteer or substitute upon entry into the military or naval service of the United States shall be paid in installments, as follows: one third at the time of the muster into service of such volunteer or substitute; one third at the expiration of half the term of service; and one third at the expiration of the term of such service, unless sooner discharged by reason of wounds received in battle. And in case of his death while in service, the residue of his bounty unpaid shall be paid to his widow, if he shall have left a widow; if not, to his children, or, if there be none, to his mother, if she be a widow.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the remainder of the term of service of any person who shall hereafter enter the military or naval service as a volunteer or drafted man, and shall desert therefrom, or be discharged by reason of physical disability, existing prior to such entry into service, shall be added to the amount of service due from the district to which such volunteer or drafted man shall have been credited, and the same shall be filled up from such district by enlistment or draft.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the other lawful penalties of the crime of desertion from the military or naval service, all persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States, who shall not return to said service or report themselves to a provost marshal within sixty days after the passage of this act, shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship, and their rights to become citizens; and such deserters shall be forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, or of exercising any of the rights of citizens thereof, and all persons who shall hereafter desert the military or naval service shall be liable to the penalties of this section.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized and required forthwith, on the passage of this act, to issue his proclamation setting forth the provisions of the preceding section.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts to allow this bill to be made the special order of the day for to-morrow at this hour. It will not delay it much. I do not know how it is with other Senators, but the pendency of this measure had escaped my observation, and it is a subject in which the country feels a very sensitive interest.

Mr. WILSON. I have called it up this morning by the consent of the Senator from Illinois, with the understanding that it should not displace his measure; and I am willing, having called the attention of the Senate to the bill, to let it go over until to-morrow, in the hope that we shall then take it up and act upon it and finish it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. WILSON. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER.

Mr. POWELL. I move to postpone all pending and prior orders for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 392, supplementary to an act approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads." The object of the bill is to authorize the construction of a railway bridge across the Ohio river at the falls. My object in desiring to take up the bill now is to make it the special order for Monday next at one o'clock. I do not wish to press its consideration to-day.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. I now move that its further consideration be postponed to and made the special order of the day for Monday next at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to make another bill for another bridge across the Ohio river the special order of the day at the same time with the one mentioned by the Senator from Kentucky.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator indicate the bill?

Mr. COLLAMER. It is Senate bill No. 413, which I reported this morning, to establish a certain post road, to authorize the construction of the Covington and Cincinnati bridge. I move to take up that bill with a view of making it the special order for Monday also.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I now move that its further consideration be postponed to and made the special order of the day for Monday next at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD.

Mr. DIXON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 411, to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia." I think it will take but a few moments to consider it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend the act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia, approved July 1, 1864, in the first section by striking out all after the words "along H street north to Seventeenth street west, intersecting the double-track road," and inserting:

Also a double or single-track railway, commencing at the intersection of D street north and Four-and-a-half street west, along Four-and-a-half street west to the gate of the arsenal; also double or single-track branch railway, commencing at the intersection of Ninth street west and the Washington canal, along Ninth street west to M street north, along M street north to Twentieth street west, and along Twelfth street west to the Washington canal and Maryland avenue to the Potomac river; also a double or single-track branch railway, commencing at the intersection of Massachusetts avenue and H street north, along Massachusetts avenue to K street north, along K street north to the Circle, with the privilege of extending the said branch road at any time along K street north to Rock creek, across the bridge over Rock creek to Water street, Georgetown, along Water street in Georgetown to Montgomery street, along Montgomery street to Gay street, and along Gay street and First street to Fayette street, Georgetown, with the privilege of extending at any time the road now in operation from Seventeenth street west to the Capitol, from the present terminus of said road on A street north, along A street north to First street east, along First street east to East Capitol street, along East Capitol street to Ninth street east, along Ninth street east to L street south, with the right to run public carriages thereon, drawn by horse power, receiving therefor a rate of fare not exceeding eight cents per passenger, for any distance between the termini of either of the said main railways, or between the termini of said branch railways, or between either terminus of said main railway and the termini of either of said branch railways: Provided, That the use and maintenance of the said road shall be subject to the municipal regulations of the city of Washington within its corporate limits.

The second section proposes to amend section eight of the act of incorporation, by striking out the words "five hundred thousand dollars."

The third section proposes to amend section seventeen of the act of incorporation so as to allow the corporation three years from the date of the approval of this bill in which to complete the railways herein described and those described in the act to which it is an amendment.

The fourth section proposes to amend the twenty-second section of the act of incorporation by striking out the words "at the rate of twenty-five for one dollar."

The first amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was in line twenty-five of section one to strike out "Montgomery street" in each place where it occurs, and insert "Green street."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines three and four of section two, to insert "$1,000,000" as the capital stock of the company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following proviso to section two:

Provided, That the directors of said Metropolitan Railroad Company shall have power to require the subscribers to the capital stock to pay the amount by them respectively subscribed at such time, in such manner, and in such installments as they may deem proper; and if any stockholders shall refuse or neglect to pay any installments, as required by a resolution of the board of directors, after reasonable notice of the same, the said board of directors may forfeit said stock and all previous payments thereon for the use of said corporation, under such general regulations as may be adopted in the by laws of said corporation, or may sue for and collect the same in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. FARWELL. I do not know that I understand that proposition entirely, but it seems to me to be rather a harsh measure. If I understand it aright, a man may pay in three fourths of the amount of his stock, and if he fails to pay the balance it is all lost. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that there should be a provision that it might be sold.

Mr. DIXON. This provision is one that has been customary in other acts of incorporation, but it happened to be omitted in this charter, I suppose by accident.

Mr. CONNESS. Let the amendment be read again.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. This is an extraordinary provision. The management of the corporation, with a provision of that kind could, to use a common phrase, squeeze out whom they pleased. I never saw such a provision in any charter. It may be contained in some laws providing for the organization of companies, but the general and more common and equitable rule is that delinquent stockholders shall be subject to have their stock sold; that upon public notice of the delinquency to the stockholders, and a time fixed within which they shall be required to pay, if then the assessments shall remain unpaid, as many shares of the stock shall be sold as will pay the assessment due, not the entire stock sacrificed.

The provision is objectionable and obnoxious in another sense, that you deprive a man of his property without giving him his day in court, without giving him an opportunity to appear. I have no amendment prepared to meet the case, but it is clear that the provision as it is should not pass. It is investing the management of the corporation with the power to induce parties to take stock, and then confiscate it almost at their pleasure.

Mr. DIXON. I have no objection to any amendment which shall carry out the views of the Senator from California, providing for the sale of the stock. It will amount in fact to the same thing. This is not such a great wrong as the Senator supposes. A man subscribes for stock; he declines to pay for it; he declines to pay his installments. It is not very uncommon to say in such cases that the stock shall be forfeited. If it is not valuable enough for the owner to pay the installments on it, of course it cannot be worth a great deal. In such a case, all he has to do is to pay his installments and redeem his stock. But at the same time I am perfectly satisfied with an amendment which the Senator may propose, providing for a sale of the stock on public notice. Suppose we make the clause read thus:

If any stockholder shall refuse or neglect to pay any installment as required by a resolution of the board of directors, after reasonable notice of the same, the said board of directors may sell said stock at public auction after giving due notice.

Would that satisfy the Senator?

Mr. CONNESS. Even that would not be enough. It is impossible to improvise here an amendment providing the necessary conditions. The stock should not only be required to be sold at auction, but no greater part of the delinquent stock should be sold than was necessary to pay the assessment due.

Mr. DIXON. Of course that would follow.

Mr. CONNESS. That would not follow unless it was provided for. It is the business of the committee to report these conditions, and not of Senators to improvise important amendments like this at their desks; indeed it cannot be done. I would suggest, as has been suggested by a Senator on my right, that a stockholder may have paid his assessments to the extent of two thirds of the amount required for full payment of the stock, and then he may die, and it will be in the power of the company to confiscate that stock and destroy the property of his heirs and his successors in it. In the State where I live these provisions are always contained in and required by the general corporation laws of the State.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator will see that notice is already required. The provision is that after refusal to pay the installments as required by the board of directors, after reasonable notice of the same, the board may forfeit the stock. If the Senator will consent that the other amendments shall be proceeded with, I think that I can in a moment draw an amendment which will suit him on this point. Let this amendment be passed over informally for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over for the present.

The next amendment was to add to the fifth section the words "at the rate of sixteen for the dollar," so as to make the section read:

That the twenty-second section be, and hereby is, amended by striking out the words "at the rate of twenty-five for one dollar," and inserting the words "at the rate of sixteen for the dollar."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. Now let the bill be laid aside informally that I may prepare the amendment to which I referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be done.

CONDUCT OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HALE. While the Senator from Connecticut is perfecting his bill, I wish to ask the Senate to take up a resolution of inquiry addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, which I submitted a few days ago.

The resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be instructed to inform the Senate whether the argument of the judges advocate on the trial of Franklin W. Smith has been printed by order of the Navy Department, or any officer of that branch of the service, and whether the same has been done at the expense of the Treasury of the United States, how large an edition of the same has been published, and what use has been made of the copies thus published. Also, whether any commissioners, agents, or detectives have been employed by the said Navy Department, or any officer thereof, since January 1, 1864; if so, how many; what sum or sums have been paid them; what instructions were given to them verbally or in writing, either by the Secretary of the Navy or the Assistant Secretary, and especially whether any instructions were given to said detectives or agents, or either of them, by said Secretary or Assistant Secretary, or by any one else for them, or with the knowledge, advice, or consent of either of them, to inquire into the conduct or business transactions of any member of either House of Congress; and also how much expense has been incurred by such examinations, the particulars thereof, the fund from which they have been paid, and the law authorizing the same.

AGRICULTURAL PART OF CENSUS REPORT.

Mr. HARLAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture:

Resolved, That two thousand copies of the agricultural part of the Census Report for 1860 be printed for the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 359.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to inquire what the bill is.

Mr. HENDERSON. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Illinois, I will say that it is a bill which I attempted the other day to get before the Senate. It is a bill to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States, which was made the special order for last Tuesday.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I cannot consent to that; and as there is to be a wrangle about business, I must insist—

Mr. DIXON. I hope the Senator will allow my bill, which was laid aside informally, to be taken up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should have no objection to that, but the Senator sees what is being done.

Mr. DIXON. The bill to which I alluded was laid aside informally, with the understanding that it should come up again in five minutes. It will not take long to pass it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am exceedingly sorry that the Senator from Illinois will not consent—

Mr. DIXON. I suggest to the Chair that there was a matter already before the Senate which was merely informally laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Precisely; and the Senator from Missouri moves to postpone it; that is the question pending.

Mr. DIXON. I hope it will not be postponed.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire that the bill to which I called attention shall be taken up. My colleague who has been absent for the last week is now present. The Senate will recollect the unsuccessful effort that I made a few mornings ago to get it up. If the Senate intend to consider the bill, I want it considered now. The Senator from Illinois says it will produce a wrangle. I apprehend not. The Military Committee have reported it unanimously, and I hope that it will be taken up and acted on. I cannot see any objection to it. It provides for the appointment of commissioners to ascertain the accounts between the State of Missouri and the United States for troops called out by Federal officers, and not by the State authorities. I do not ask a dollar for troops called out by the State. Our people have been under arms very frequently under State authority, and for that I do not ask a dollar; but they have been called out by Federal officers, and I desire that payment shall be made.

The Senator from Illinois says that he cannot consent to the bill being taken up, and says it very warmly and decidedly. I am sorry that the Senator from Illinois, who seems to take entire charge of the Senate this morning, cannot consent. I will go over to see if I can procure his consent; and, if I can succeed in doing so, it really seems I may stand some chance of getting the bill before the Senate. I do not see the use of speaking in that kind of style. I do not trouble the Senate often.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think that the remarks of the Senator from Missouri are entirely uncalled for, and entirely out of place. The Senator from Missouri knows as well as I know that a subject was under consideration yesterday. He knows as well as I do that it is the order of the day to-day, and that several Senators have risen and asked to have it laid aside informally, and, as I had charge of the measure, appealed to me to consent to it. He knows very well that it is an every-day practice, when a member of the Senate is charged with a bill and some small matter is interposed, to ask that Senator to give his consent to let that matter come in informally. It has been done this morning. When I said I could not consent to it, I meant that having charge of the joint resolution which is the order of the day, I considered it my duty to press it to a vote. And for the Senator to undertake to create an impression in the Senate or anywhere else that I was assuming to control the Senate or to dictate as to its business is not warranted by anything that has occurred. It is unjust to me, and unjust to himself, if he will reflect.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator knows just as well as I do that I would not do any injustice to him. If nothing had been said, in all probability we could have passed the bill during the morning hour; but a discussion has come up. Of course the Senator's resolution will not be in order until one o'clock, at the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator is entirely mistaken; it is in order all the time; it was taken up in the morning hour and is in order during that hour. The Chair has so decided.

Mr. HENDERSON. I presume that as a member of the Senate I have a right to call up the bill to which I have referred. I desire that it shall be acted upon by the Senate. If the Senate are disposed to defeat the bill, they can do so. I now move to postpone all prior orders and take it up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the pending motion.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is a bill in which my State is deeply interested, and I hope the Senate will take it up and act upon it.

Mr. DIXON. I hope the bill which I called up will be proceeded with. It will not take time.

Mr. BROWN. I ask leave to say a word or two before the vote is taken on the motion of my colleague. I should like to agree with the Senate to take up this measure at this time and pass it. It is a question in which we are deeply interested, in regard to which time is of more value to us than it is with reference to any other measure now pending before the Senate. I do not see why objection should be maintained against taking it up here and now, when the bill with which it is brought into antagonism is likely to be debated for four or five days, and can certainly go over without any prejudice. This bill, it will be remembered, was made the special order for three days ago; when the time for the special order arrived, it was passed over informally in some way, and, although the Senate voted to take it up, it was not done by some accident. I would request, so far as I can have any influence with the Senate, that if they are desirous of passing this measure, which is a measure of great interest to the State, they will take it up and do so now, so as to give us an opportunity of having action in the House of Representatives. Unless we can get it acted upon here at an early stage of the session, it will be impossible to obtain action there. I ask for a division on the question of taking it up.

Mr. DIXON. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I think he makes a mistake in attempting to interpose to prevent the passage of the bill which was called up by me. It seems to me it is unreasonable to delay the passage of that bill. It was called up and partially acted upon and then laid aside informally. In my judgment it will not take five minutes to dispose of it. I think it would have been passed long ago if the Senator from Missouri had allowed us to go on with it. I trust, therefore, the Senate will not adopt the motion of the Senator from Missouri, but will proceed with the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to inquire whether the resolution of which the Senator from Illinois has charge will not come up of its own force at one o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to say to the Senator from Missouri that there is no bill that I would more readily vote to proceed to the consideration of than that which he desires the Senate to consider this morning, except the measure that the Senator from Illinois has in charge. I believe nearly everybody agrees that something should be done in regard to that subject between now and next Wednesday.

Mr. BROWN. I will state that I was not present yesterday, and did not know what was the pending matter before the Senate. I supposed it was the local bill which has been before us this morning.

Mr. GRIMES. I would vote most freely with the Senator from Missouri to take up his bill in preference to any local bill.

Mr. BROWN. If my colleague will consent, I am willing to withdraw the motion for the time.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 547) for the relief of Jean M. Lander, widow of F. W. Lander, deceased;

A bill (H. R. No. 571) for the relief of Jethro Bonney;

A bill (H. R. No. 624) to provide for the payment of the value of certain lands and improvements of private citizens appropriated by the United States for Indian reservations in the Territory of Washington; and

A bill (H. R. No. 713) for the relief of Hull & Cozzens, and John Naylor & Co.

REPRESENTATION IN ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the unfinished business of yesterday now comes up. The joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. TEN Eyck] to strike out the word "Louisiana" from the preamble.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the question pending before the Senate will have no practical effect whatever in disposing of the result of the presidential canvass. Whether the votes of the States named in the preamble to this resolution are counted in or counted out or not counted at all, the result is not to be changed. So far, therefore, as that question is concerned, this whole discussion is perfectly immaterial. The action of the Senate one way or the other has nothing to do with the result.

But the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] says that now is the time to fix the law which shall perhaps have effect on some future presidential canvass. Why the necessity of acting upon it now any more than at any time within the next four years? There cannot be another presidential canvass until four years from last fall. Why this haste, and why the necessity now of acting upon a matter which has no practical reference to the present canvass and can have no reference to any other canvass for at least four years to come. At any day of any session of Congress from this time forward for four years, we can just as well act on the question as we can act on it now.

My honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] says that for the good order of the convention when the Senate and House of Representatives meet together to canvass these votes, he thinks some legislation is necessary, for he says that in 1857 when the Senate of the United States under the presidency of Mason, of Virginia, went into the House of Representatives, some proceedings occurred there that were discreditable and ridiculous, and that Mason, for some supposed offense or other, undertook to take the Senate out of the joint convention and marched out at the head of some Senators, they following him two and two, presenting a ridiculous aspect to the country and the civilized world. They went out amid the jeers of all who were present, my friend says.

But 1857 was an exceptional case. We have had eighteen joint conventions of the Senate and House of Representatives: did my friend from Ohio ever hear of any discreditable proceedings on any other occasion than in 1857? Never. Have we no confidence in ourselves; have we no confidence in the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives, that they can sit in joint convention and yet not be guilty of any breaches of decorum or gentlemanly conduct? Are we to suppose that now the Senate of the United States has Mason of Virginia to preside over it? We know who is the Presiding Officer of the Senate, and we know the Senate; we know the House; and we have as much confidence in them as was felt in any House, or in any Senate, or in any Presiding Officers of either of the two bodies from the beginning of the Government. I have as much confidence in the present Presiding Officers to keep order and decorum in these proceedings as I have in any of the Presiding Officers of these two Houses from the beginning of the Government to the present time.

Mr. President, I said yesterday that in my opinion Congress has no power in its legislative capacity, acting as we are now acting, to declare in relation to votes that have already been given, that those votes are null and void. Sir, the question is not before us; the votes are not before us; and we cannot act on those votes to ratify or to annul them. The votes were given by the electors of the several States, sealed up under the provisions of the Constitution, and sent to the President of the Senate, the seals unbroken, and there is no power that has the right to break them until he meets the joint convention of the two Houses, and then, under the constitutional provision, they are to be opened in their presence, and I say that it is usurpation on the part of Congress to undertake to act upon those votes which are sealed up from them, and which they have no power to look at, either to affirm their validity or to declare them null.

I maintain, too, sir, that it is a most dangerous precedent for Congress to undertake to speak of votes that have already been given declaring them to be null and void. It is possible, as I said before, that by some legislation in advance of the giving of those votes Congress might make provision by law on this subject. I have some doubts, however, in relation to that; but upon that question I shall not occupy the attention of the Senate. I said yesterday all I desired to say in regard to it. But, sir, I shall come now to the immediate question, the one pending, the question of Louisiana, which the Senator from New Jersey moves as an exception to the other States that are mentioned in this resolution.

And first of all, the interest which I feel in this question is because, in my judgment, the resolution of the Senate upon this incidental question expresses its opinion upon the validity or the invalidity of the constitution adopted by the people of Louisiana. Believing, as I do, that that is a most important question; believing, as I do, that it is wholly unnecessary for us now in this incidental way to enter upon the discussion and decision of that question, I think it is unwise to press this resolution at the present moment. But, sir, the question seems to be raised, and gentlemen express their opinion upon it; and I propose to call the attention of the Senate to some points involved in it, and to some of the facts bearing on the validity of this present constitution of Louisiana. And what are the facts? The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] declares that this election of the people of Louisiana was carried by military power, by military authority, and is the result of military dictation and military despotism over the people of Louisiana. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] responds to this with all his heart. He says it is a mere military dictation, a military election, and, more than all, he says it is a miserable farce.

Mr. President, we look upon a strange spectacle here when the two extremes in this body come together in this way. One would suppose that Pilate and Herod had joined hands both to attack the Administration in its policy on this subject, and to see if they could crucify the free

State of Louisiana. Sir, let us look at the facts of this case, strip off a little of this passionate declamation, and come down to the naked truth.

On the 22d day of February a year ago an election was held at which there were cast eleven thousand four hundred and fourteen votes for this constitution of Louisiana. But the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Ohio say it was the military authorities that controlled this election in Louisiana. Sir, I take issue with them upon the fact. It is not true that the military authorities controlled the election. The election was fixed for the 22d day of February, says General Banks.

Mr. WADE. Will the Senator tell me who authorized the election for a convention; who initiated it?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. General Banks issued his order notifying the people of the State of Louisiana to hold an election. I am speaking of that election.

Mr. WADE. Let me inquire if the request of a military commander in such a case is not just about equal to a command. Is there any real difference?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I shall have occasion before I finish my remarks to discuss this question in the aspect of what my friend calls a military despotism over the people of Louisiana, and I think I shall be able to satisfy him even, although it is a great undertaking to do it, that the only possible mode in which a military government can be surrendered to the civil administration of the people of a State must be that the initiative shall be taken in the first instance by the governor in military command inviting the people in their civil capacity to enter upon the election.

Mr. POWELL. If the Senator will allow me, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If it is a question bearing on this subject I have no objection; but I propose to submit some observations on the subject and the Senator can reply when I get through.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator has indicated that the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Kentucky were incorrect in saying that there was military interference. I ask the Senator whether the military authorities did not prescribe the qualification of voters. Did they not assume by military orders to alter the constitution of Louisiana and prescribe different qualifications for voters from those fixed by that instrument?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On that point the constitution of Louisiana was adopted as the rule prescribing the qualifications of voters, with this exception, that the citizens of Louisiana who had enlisted into the armies of the United States were permitted to vote. The only change, the only alteration was, not that citizens of other States were permitted to vote, but that citizens of Louisiana who had enlisted into the Army and were then serving in Louisiana, shall be entitled to vote.

Mr. POWELL. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that General Banks states in this paper that they were required to take the oath prescribed in the President's amnesty proclamation of December 8, 1863, and that of itself was prescribing a qualification of voters different from the prescription made by the constitution and laws of Louisiana.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will read what General Banks says:

"The order relating to the election is herewith inclosed. It was fixed for the 22d day of February. Three candidates were presented, and the canvass was general and spirited, each party sustaining its candidates by public meetings, precisely in the same manner as in a State unaffected by the revolution.

"Eleven thousand four hundred and fourteen votes were polled at this election.

"The average vote for ten years previous to the rebellion in these parishes was fifteen to sixteen thousand."

Eleven thousand four hundred and fourteen voting now where there were but fifteen or sixteen thousand before the rebellion began.

"In this election no person voted who was not by the constitution and laws of Louisiana a voter, except one class of persons. These were the soldiers who, as citizens of Louisiana, had enlisted in the armies of the United States.

"A provision of the constitution prohibited men enlisted in the Army or Navy from voting. It was understood to be the intention of this provision of the constitution that soldiers or sailors should not become voters under a mere residence in the State while under orders as soldiers or sailors.

"While it would be perfectly just that a citizen of another State sent into Louisiana under military orders should not be permitted to gain a residence while acting under these orders, it was not thought to be just that a citizen who enlisted in the Army of the United States for the defense of his own State should be deprived by such enlistment of the right of suffrage. It was thought that any Legislature of the State would change that provision, and the order of election directed the change upon this principle."

That was the only change that was made by military authority, a change authorizing citizens of Louisiana who had enlisted in the Army of the United States in Louisiana to vote. We have done the same thing in Wisconsin, in Ohio, in Pennsylvania, in New York, all growing out of exigencies which have occurred since this rebellion began, passing laws authorizing men, although in the Army of the United States, still to take part in the elections, providing that they should not be deprived of their rights of citizenship because they had enlisted in the Army to bear all the sacrifices which are necessary to defend their country in this struggle. And, sir, I maintain that there was nothing wrong in this. But even if it were wrong, it did not affect the result in the slightest degree, for there were only eight hundred and eight of all the soldiers who voted. Out of eleven thousand four hundred and fourteen voters, I say to the Senator from Ohio but eight hundred and eight soldiers voted; and do you complain of this as a military election and held under military dictation? Was the election carried by soldiers' votes or by military power and military authority? These soldiers who voted did not all vote one way; a part of the soldiers voted on one side and a part voted on the other. They voted with perfect freedom, without any restraint or constraint whatever. There are nearly ten thousand persons enlisted in the Army of the United States from Louisiana, including both whites and blacks. General Banks says:

"Of these, in the election of the 22d of February, eight hundred and eight soldiers and sailors voted at the different military posts."

"A separate registry is made of their votes, a copy of which is with the Committee of Elections of the House of Representatives."

He says further:

"I do not believe that five hundred persons voted in this election of the 22d of February who were not citizens of the State previous to the rebellion, and every candidate for office was either a native of the State or had been identified with its public affairs for fifteen or twenty years."

It was no imported election into the State of Louisiana. It was no election by soldiers or sailors who were under the authority of any military commander imported into the State of Louisiana. It was only the people of Louisiana and the soldiers of Louisiana who were voting upon the adoption of a constitution for themselves. All these charges of military usurpation and military dictation, and that it was a mere farce, fall to the ground together. They are not true.

Nor was it an election controlled by Federal office-holders. What General Banks says is true, that the Federal office-holders of Louisiana, civil or military, did not assume to exercise so much influence upon the result of the election in Louisiana as they do in New York, Massachusetts, and every other State in the Union where Federal officers are appointed. Allow me to read from his statement again on that subject:

"Neither of these elections were controlled by the officers of the Government, civil or military. On the contrary, the influence of the officers of the Government, both civil and military, was indifferent, if not hostile, to the organization."

We all know that the officers who were appointed in Louisiana under the control of one of the Departments of this Government, taking a certain ground, as they did, in the affairs of Louisiana, looked rather with hostility than with friendship upon the effort at the reorganization of that State and the construction of its free constitution, and accordingly we find that—

"The registrar of voters states that of one hundred and twenty persons employed in one department of the Treasury offices only twenty-five voted for or against the abolition of slavery in the election of the 5th of September."

How much interest did the office-holders in the State of Louisiana take in attempting to get up this State organization, which the Senator from Ohio denounces as a miserable farce, and which the Senator from Kentucky says was a military usurpation? They did nothing at all. General Banks says again:

"And in each of the general elections the soldiers who voted followed their own inclinations, as shown by the record, voting for or against the different candidates and constitution as they chose."

Does this show that there was a command of some military officer requiring a certain constitution to be adopted or a certain course to be carried, when, of the very soldiers under his command, some were voting for and some against it, voting indifferently, following their own inclinations, without the slightest intimation of an opinion or wish to control the action of those men in that State?

"At one post the entire vote in the election of February would be in favor of one candidate, while at another military post the larger majority or entire military vote would be in favor of another."

This shows that there was no concert among the military commanders of Louisiana coming from the commander-in-chief of the department requiring votes to be given or a certain constitution to be adopted. There was no concert, no conspiracy, no domination. It is all a false assumption, from beginning to end. I believe there is no man who knows General Banks that questions his word for truth and veracity, and his honor is as unimpeached and unimpeachable as that of any gentleman who sits on this floor. General Banks says:

"I desire to state, in the most unqualified terms, that no effort whatever was made on the part of the military authorities to influence the citizens of the State, either in the selection of candidates or in the election of officers, and that the direct influence of the Government of the United States was less in Louisiana than in the election probably of any other State of the Union, and that the officers representing the Government, both civil and military, were divided so far as they entertained or expressed opinions upon the question of candidates and upon the policy pursued in the organization of the government."

Here is his unqualified declaration of a fact which he himself, the commander-in-chief of the department, is the only living man who certainly knows; and upon his word of honor as a man and as commander-in-chief of that department, he avers that there was no influence undertaken to be exercised by the military authorities to control or to influence the determination of these elections. And yet my friend from Ohio [Mr. WADE] says it is a farce; and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] joins with him, and says it is a military dictation and a military usurpation! Sir, am I too strong in my language when I say the extremes join hands together here in their war on the Administration and in their determination to crucify the free State of Louisiana asking for her representation on this floor and the floor of the other House?

Now, Mr. President, let us go a little further into these figures. I do not propose to be blinded, nor led off the track by this kind of passionate denunciation and declamation that we have heard on this subject. What are the facts? When you come down to the figures you find that the average vote in the State of Louisiana, for ten years, has been thirty-four thousand. The highest vote that was given in ten years has been only fifty-one thousand. Where are those voters now? Forty thousand have enlisted in the rebel armies. The voting population and the fighting population of a State run along together, almost pari passu. I refer now to the white population of that State. We know that our voting population in the free States and our fighting population are very nearly the same. Fifty-one thousand was the highest voting population of Louisiana in any election in ten years, and forty thousand have enlisted in the rebel armies. Undoubtedly three fourths of those are in their graves, and those that live are still in the rebel armies, for the conscription of the rebels, wherever they have had the opportunity to do it, has been almost universal, taking every able-bodied man in whole counties and townships and parishes into the army of the rebellion. If you deduct from fifty-one thousand, the highest vote which Louisiana has ever given in ten years, the forty thousand who have gone into the rebel armies, how many remain? Eleven thousand would remain, if their voting and fighting population were equal in numbers; and the vote shows that eleven thousand four hundred and fourteen freely gave their votes at the election which occurred on the 23d day of February, 1864. Does the Senator from Ohio stand up here denouncing this as a miserable sham, when a vote has been given equal to the difference between the rebel population enlisting into the rebel armies and the whole voting population of Louisiana during the last ten years? Sir, this kind of declamation will not bear the test of examination when you come down to the truth and look into the facts and figures in this case.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will permit me—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope the Senator will allow me to finish my remarks. I do not desire to take up a great deal of time, and I prefer to go through with what I have to say; and then I will answer any question the Senate desires.

Mr. President, I do not assume that in all cases the voting population and the fighting population are the same, but they run along nearly the same, and it is but fair to count the one as about equal to the other. But suppose there is a considerable difference. In my opinion, the vote of eleven thousand four hundred and fourteen which was given for this constitution, is two thirds, if not three fourths, of all the loyal men of Louisiana now alive and living within Louisiana. Gentlemen fail to consider the vast difference in the condition of these States where this war has been going on, as it has in Louisiana. We captured and took possession at an early day of about one third, I suppose, of the real territorial extent of the State of Louisiana; we captured and took possession of the rivers; and from the very conformation of Louisiana, it is upon the banks of the rivers that her good lands all lie, and when you go back from the rivers, you go into those interminable morasses and swamps where men can hardly live at all; so that, although we do not cover the whole of the State of Louisiana by our military lines, we do cover and do hold by far the greater portion in value and the greater portion which is capable of being cultivated and inhabited as a State.

Mr. President, I was observing that men seem to forget the terrible destruction of the population in these States, both black and white, caused by the war. I have no doubt that if you could at this day take the census of both the living and the dead, it would be found that one half of the whole population of Louisiana, white and black, is beneath the sod, growing out of the terrible convulsions which this war has produced and the terrible sacrifices and sufferings and deaths that have followed in its train. General Banks estimates it at very nearly the same figure. He says the whole population of Louisiana now existing does not exceed four hundred and fifty thousand, although in the beginning of this contest it was between seven and eight hundred thousand. Not only have the white men who were the voters in Louisiana enlisted in the rebel armies to the amount of thirty thousand, but multitudes of those who were subject to do so have fled from Louisiana and have gone abroad to Europe; they have left the State; they are not there; they perhaps will never be there again. But of the loyal people now living two thirds, three fourths, I believe, took part in the election on the adoption of this constitution.

The Senator from Ohio, in the course of his remarks, undertook to denounce in very strong terms the policy adopted or suggested by the President of the United States in his message as the policy upon which he would attempt the reorganization of civil government and civil institutions in the States where the insurrection had prevailed. There has been so much said about it, and so much misrepresentation also, that I desire for a few brief moments to call the attention of the Senate to that proposition.

Every person knows that there must be some form of government in these States. If, with our armies, we enter into a State or country, and take possession of it by military power, some form of government must be established—military, of course, in the first instance. The civil government is displaced, so to speak, by military power. In the midst of arms the laws are silent, is the old expression of the Romans, inter arma silent leges. When the people of a district become so far obedient to their obligations of loyalty to the Government which thus assumes, by military power, to put down an insurrection, an attempt may be made to surrender the military power and establish a civil administration by the people themselves. For a time the form of government may be, to a certain extent, a mixed form, both of civil and military power, each leaning upon the other. As the thing progresses and grows still further, the military power may be more and more withdrawn, and still greater power and authority given to the civil administration and the civil officers of the Government.

Now, sir, what is the actual state of the case in relation to Louisiana? When we first captured New Orleans, and by our forces took possession of the rivers and the lands adjoining, there could be no government but that of a military character. But after an experience of one, two, or three years, the people there became so well satisfied of the great mistake of going into rebellion against the Government of the United States and of the necessity of submitting to its authority and its jurisdiction, that they began to come back to their allegiance to this Government, and were willing to join in the organization of the civil government of the State, and resume their relations to the Government of the United States. Accordingly we find that when asked to do so eleven thousand four hundred and fourteen of the loyal citizens of that State joined in the organization of a new constitution, which was submitted to the people, adopted by them, and a Legislature and other officers chosen by virtue of it, and the whole machinery of civil government put into full operation in that State. By virtue of the authority of that constitution, they now have their own government, their own Legislature, they are making municipal laws and regulations for themselves. Their courts are sitting every day in judgment upon the rights of individuals. Under the authority of this new constitution all the relations of life are now being regulated. Under the authority of this new constitution, I tell my friend from Ohio that nearly ninety thousand slaves, who were not reached by the emancipation proclamation, have had their fetters knocked from their limbs and freedom given to them. Yes, sir, freedom has been given to ninety thousand slaves by this very constitution which he would undertake to trample under his feet as a military usurpation and as a miserable farce. Can he stand up in the face of this country, when Louisiana presents herself in this attitude as a free State, knocking off the chains from ninety thousand of her slaves whom the emancipation proclamation did not reach, (for they were excepted,) and deny to free Louisiana her rights of representation here, and her right to be heard as one of the free States of this Union in voting upon the very constitutional amendment which we have submitted to the States for their ratification?

Mr. WADE. Does the Senator—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I shall soon be through, and I will then hear the gentleman from Ohio at length.

Mr. WADE. No, you will not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Well, I will hear him, then, very briefly.

Mr. WADE. You will not hear him at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That perhaps will be better yet.

Mr. President, I can very well understand why the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] is opposed to recognizing this free constitution of Louisiana, which sets free almost ninety thousand slaves; but I did not expect that the Senator from Ohio would object to it for that reason, among others. I expected that the Senator from Ohio, and the friends of freedom on this floor, would take the free States by the hand, one after another, as they presented themselves here, and welcome them into the family of free States. I did not expect opposition from the Senator from Ohio as I did from the Senator from Kentucky. He could consistently oppose it; for he is opposed to emancipation, opposed to the adoption of the free constitution of Louisiana, opposed to allowing Louisiana to vote on the constitutional amendment which we have just submitted to the States, and whose vote may be necessary to its ratification. It requires, as I am informed, twenty-seven votes, or the votes of twenty-seven Legislatures of the different States, in order to ratify the constitutional amendment; and by no ciphering of mine can I see how they are to be obtained unless you allow the Legislature of the free State of Louisiana to express her voice on the subject. Is the Senator from Ohio prepared to prevent that? Go tell it to the free people of this country that upon the floor of the Senate the Senator from Ohio, who has been looked upon as the champion of freedom, is now taking position side by side with the Senator from Kentucky to denounce as a military usurpation and as a miserable farce the adoption of a free constitution by the people of Louisiana.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 37.

But, sir, to return once more to this much-denounced policy of the President. It is denounced as a military usurpation. It is directly the reverse of that. It is an attempt on the part of the President to lay down the military power, to put it into the hands of the civilians; to take it from the Army and to give it to the people. What does he say? He says this in substance: "Whenever one tenth or a portion of the population equal to one tenth of the whole voting population of the district or the State before the rebellion began are willing voluntarily to undertake the business of administering civil government, I, as President of the United States and Commander-in-Chief of the Army, pledge to them my good faith that I will stand by them and try and enable them to do it." That is all there is of it. So far from being a military usurpation, it is an attempt on the part of the President to lay down his military power; and under that provision of the Constitution which compels this Government to guarantee a republican form of government to every State in the Union, the President is endeavoring in good faith to do it.

Sir, how else can it be done? These gentlemen who are denouncing with so much glibness the policy of the President had better point out some better policy. How can you lay down your military power without building up a civil power to take possession of the government? How can you do it unless you make a beginning? If you cannot begin with the whole of the people of a State, you must begin with what loyal people there are in the State; and if you can get as many as one tenth of those who are there, or a number equal to one tenth of the voters of the State who are willing to join in the attempt, is it not the duty, and the bounden duty, of the Executive to make the trial, or shall he continue to hold them as mere military conquests governed by military officers and military law? Shall there be no attempt at civil administration? We all know what martial law is. There is no people under the canopy of heaven who do not desire to get rid of martial law as fast as they can. I join with them in the desire to get rid of military law and military administration; and if you can get one tenth of the population in a State like Louisiana, where three fourths have joined the rebellion and enlisted in the rebel army, who are willing to take hold and aid in the administration of the government, it is enough to begin with. I do not say that where they amount to but one tenth their Representatives ought to be admitted to seats in Congress. The President does not recommend anything like that. But this case of Louisiana does not go upon the basis of one tenth. I have demonstrated to the Senate, and I defy the Senator from Ohio or any other Senator to show to the contrary, that at least two thirds of all the loyal people of Louisiana, and more than two thirds of the difference between the number of rebels who have joined the rebel armies and the highest vote Louisiana has given in ten years, have joined in adopting this constitution for the free State of Louisiana.

But, Mr. President, in relation to that recommendation made by the Executive, he made it as a suggestion. He did not commit himself to it as if that was the policy to be pursued and he would not pursue any other. He is willing to join hands with anybody who will propose any better policy for the reorganization of these States; but he is willing to begin even with one tenth to attempt to build up something like civil government in these States. That does not apply, however, to Louisiana; for, as I have shown you, more than two thirds, if not three fourths, of all the loyal men that now live in that State joined in electing the delegates to this convention, and in adopting this constitution. Does my friend from Ohio propose to allow the rebels of Louisiana to take part in the government of that State? Have we not already provided by law that they cannot vote unless they take the oath of allegiance, and swear to support the Constitution of the United States, and renounce all allegiance to any other or pretended government? It is the loyal people of a State alone that have a right to vote.

Sir, I believe that each department of this Government takes part in the recognition of the authorities of the several States. The Supreme Court takes its part in that recognition. For instance, there is a tribunal now erected in Louisiana purporting to be a court of the State of Louisiana. A case arises, of ejectment, if you please, deciding the title to a township of land. An appeal is brought from the decision of that court to the Supreme Court here. Some lawyer rises up in the Supreme Court of the United States, and adopting the view of the Senator from Ohio, says, "May it please the court, that court is a humbug; the constitution of Louisiana is a farce; it was adopted by military usurpation; you must not hear an appeal from that court; I move that it be dismissed." The Supreme Court look into the question, pass on the case, and they decide that the court is a regular court of Louisiana, or is not. They therefore, in that decision, perform a high office as the supreme judicial power of this Government in recognizing the judicial power of the State of Louisiana.

So, too, the Executive has his office to perform in recognizing the power of the States of the Union. When you look into the Constitution, you find that one of the greatest powers conferred upon the Executive of the United States is this very power of recognizing the authority of the State governments of the States of the Union. How does it arise? It arises just in this precise case. An insurrection breaks out in one of the States. There are two parties, and you may say they are nearly equally balanced, one for one government, one for another. Each chooses its governor; each chooses its legislature; each chooses their various officers of administration; and they commence a conflict, and there is an insurrection. Then comes an appeal to the Executive to put down an insurrection, just the case that arose in Rhode Island in the time of Dorr's rebellion, as it is called. The appeal is made to the Executive; and then is cast upon the Executive the most important question that the Executive is ever called to pronounce upon, and that is, which party is the rebellion and which party is the true government of the State where the rebellion exists. The President decides that question, and from his decision there is no appeal. That was precisely the case in Rhode Island. Dorr's rebellion arose against the existing government. They had their two legislatures and their two executives, and were ready to enter into a conflict of arms and the shedding of blood. An appeal was made to the President of the United States to put down the insurrection, and the President of the United States decided that Dorr's party were the party in rebellion and must be put down; and that ended the controversy; for in the little State of Rhode Island they would not undertake to contend when the whole power of the Government was thrown in upon one side.

Here is a power of the Executive in recognizing the existing power of a State, whether it be the true State government or the insurrectionary State government, that belongs to no other department of this Government. It does not belong to Congress. The appeal is not made to Congress to put down the insurrection in a State. It is made to the President, and the President alone can decide that question. The Supreme Court, in that case from Rhode Island, expressly decided that it was a political question over which the court had no control, nor Congress either, but which belonged to the Executive, and the Executive alone; and the Executive having decided which party constituted the rebellion and which party constituted the true government of Rhode Island, the court were bound to acquiesce in the decision of the Executive, and did so acquiesce, and sustained the old government of Rhode Island against the Dorr government.

But, Mr. President, I do not deny that Congress also has a power of recognition of these States, but it is Congress acting separately in the two Houses of Congress, and in no other way.

How do we act? Two gentlemen present themselves for admission to this floor as Senators from Louisiana. The question is at once raised. One gentleman says there is no State of Louisiana; it is a mere Territory; it is a mere farce to call it a State.

Mr. WADE. Do you say that I said that? Mr. DOOLITTLE. You did not say that; but you said it was a mere farce to call it a State; that the election was a farce.

Mr. WADE. Yes, that is it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The question is raised, first, is there any State of Louisiana? Secondly, was there a Legislature chosen in Louisiana who could elect Senators? And thirdly, do these men possess the requisite qualifications to become Senators of the United States? Those questions are raised here, discussed here, and the Senate act upon those questions and decide them, and from our decision there is no appeal.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Is it on this point?

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir; it would not be pertinent otherwise, I apprehend.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. CONNESS. With the Senator's consent, I ask him if he holds that the right of Congress to act upon the question of the organization or admission of the States now in rebellion can only occur and take place when Senators present themselves from those States here, or if the Senator denies to Congress a right to participate in the question of their reorganization as States? I desire the information, because it is important.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My opinion is very clear that we act upon the question when it is presented to us, and the Senators appear here and ask admission, first, whether there is a State to represent; secondly, whether a Legislature has been chosen which can send representatives; and, thirdly, whether the men who appear here have the constitutional qualifications; and on this subject our decision is final. The President has nothing to do with it; the House of Representatives has nothing to do with it; we have the sole and conclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator again permit me to ask him a question? I do not wish to do so if it is the slightest interruption to the Senator.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The question raised by the Senator is not one that I have discussed in this argument. It is a very distinct and different question from the one I am now discussing, and I do not intend to go into a discussion of it now. Possibly on some other occasion it may come up, and I may discuss that question; but I understand it is a very different one from that I am now arguing.

Mr. CONNESS. I so understand it; and I understand the Senator; but I understood him to say that upon the question of the admission of Senators from those States only could our right to act on the question occur or come up; and therefore I asked the Senator if he held the opinion that Congress has no right and no power to act upon the question of whether those States should be reorganized or not; because, although the Senator may not believe that the latter question is involved in the proposition now before the Senate, I differ with him, and believe that it is involved in it. Therefore I asked the Senator the question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not intend to go into the discussion of that question, which leads into a much broader field of inquiry, and there are certain other provisions of the Constitution that would have to be discussed that I do not intend to take up now. I prefer to go on with my train of argument, and finish what I have to say on the point directly under consideration.

I was saying, Mr. President, that our decision on that question of the admission of Senators is without any appeal, and whatever law might be passed by Congress would not in any way whatever abridge our supreme jurisdiction over the question of the admission or rejection of Senators in this body. The House and the Senate act entirely independent of each other on that question. Take the case of Virginia. We have Virginia represented on this floor. The House of Representatives refused Virginia any representation in that body. We act upon our own responsibility, each for itself. We determine whether men shall come in here and sit as the representatives of States. The House determine whether they shall go into that body as the Representatives of the districts of the several States.

There is another question, it seems to me, that may be involved in this decision. If we assume to say, as is contended, for by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] I believe, that these several States which have been declared to be in insurrection have ceased to be States of the United States, and are to be regarded as mere subjugated provinces or Territories, as if acquired from some foreign Power; if that doctrine is to prevail—a doctrine which finds support in some circles and places—this other consequence will follow—

Mr. HOWARD. I am quite sure the honorable Senator from Wisconsin does not intend to misstate what I said, and in order that he may understand me more clearly, I hope he will allow me to make the correction here.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. What I stated, or intended to state, was this: that the power of the United States over a conquered State which has been in rebellion is the ordinary power of the conqueror over conquered territory; but that in this particular case there is superadded to the rights and duties of the conqueror a trust, growing out of the Constitution of the United States, which is to be performed by the United States in its discretion and in due time, in the shape of a restoration of the conquered State to the Union. Congress may take its own time to bring about this restoration. There are no limitations in the Constitution in regard to the mode or time in which it is to be done. The territory, however, having been once a State, must be restored to its condition of a State by the action of Congress at some time, and according to the discretion of Congress, carrying out honestly and fairly the obligation of the Constitution; but in the mean time, understand me, I hold that while in this conquered state it is subject to be governed by military authority, by a provisional government, or by any other means which Congress may see fit to adopt; and I hold it to be the duty of Congress at an early day, as early as is reasonable and practicable, to pass an act which shall apply to all such cases, and not to leave it to the unlimited discretion of the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The point that I understood the Senator to make the other day, and I am not quite clear now whether I understand him to controvert it, was, that these States once declared in insurrection cease to be States of the Union. If I was mistaken in that I am glad to be corrected.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator will allow me a moment—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly; I do not wish to misunderstand the Senator.

Mr. HOWARD. If they are States in insurrection, as they have been pronounced to be by the constituted authorities of the United States, then as States, as political communities, they are enemies of the United States. Can a community which is an enemy of the United States be treated as one of the United States? It is only necessary to ask the question to answer it. De facto these States are out of the Union, and all the gentleman's argument and all he may imagine cannot, de facto, constitute them States until our arms have triumphed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I of course did not wish to misunderstand or misrepresent the Senator from Michigan. I understand him now to say that they are out of the Union.

Mr. HOWARD. De facto.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. De facto out of the Union.

Mr. HOWARD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. De facto out of the Union; they are no longer States of the Union. I do not wish to charge upon that Senator doctrines that he does not entertain. I know that it has been advocated in certain other quarters that those States, by virtue of their insurrection, have ceased to exist as States, are no longer States of the Union; that they are not only out of the Union, but have ceased to be States at all. I do not understand precisely whether the Senator believes in that or not. He perhaps raises a distinction between States de facto and States de jure. Perhaps he admits that de jure they are States in the Union, but de facto they are States out of the Union. But I do not wish to go into an argument with him as to his views on that subject. I simply wish not to misunderstand him.

Now, I understand the Senator from Michigan to say that he regards them as States de facto out of the Union, and as States hostile to the United States, as public enemies. There is another provision of our Constitution that ought not to be forgotten; and that is, that when we elect a President and Vice President they must both be residents of some State of the Union. We have elected Mr. Lincoln from Illinois. Undoubtedly that is a State in the Union. We have also elected Andrew Johnson from the State of Tennessee as Vice President of the United States. Is he a public enemy? Does he live in a State of this Union, or does he live in some subjugated territory?

Sir, whatever fine-spun theories gentlemen may give loose to in their imaginations, I tell you that the doctrine that any one of these States is out of the Union is the very doctrine which we have been fighting against from the beginning. The very ground on which we stand is, that they are not out of the Union, that they have no power to go out of the Union; and it is to maintain that doctrine that we have poured out our treasure and our blood like water upon every battle-field. In my opinion the doctrine—I do not say that the Senator contends for it, for I do not precisely understand his position—but the doctrine that says these States are no longer States of the United States is one huge, infernal, constitutional lie, that would stamp all our conduct from the beginning as murder and cover us all over with blood. When it comes to be discussed, it is the most abhorrent doctrine that can be presented to the American people. And I tell you that whatever fine-spun theories politicians may adopt here at Washington or elsewhere, when the convention came to meet at Baltimore freshly representing the people of the United States, they trampled the miserable humbug under their feet by nominating Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, as Vice President of the United States—Tennessee still a State of the United States, although its people have been driven into insurrection and rebellion.

Mr. SUMNER. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am nearly through.

Mr. SUMNER. I understood the Senator a few moments ago to say that the Constitution required that the President and Vice President should come from two different States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not be residents of the same State.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the Senator has not quoted it correctly. I have it before me. It is as follows:

"The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for President and Vice President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves."

All that is required is that the candidate shall be a citizen of the United States; and I presume nobody ever questioned that Andrew Johnson was a great and loyal citizen of the United States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Constitution also provides that—

"No person, except a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President."

And there is another provision in the Constitution requiring their residence in the States of the Union.

Mr. President, I insist that on this incidental question as to how the joint convention of the two Houses shall be conducted, which has been conducted heretofore during eighteen different sessions with no difficulty whatever, except in the single case of 1857, when some indecorous conduct under the lead of James M. Mason, of Virginia, occurred, there is no necessity that we should enter upon the discussion and the agitation of the questions which have been debated here and urged as the foundation for the adoption of this resolution. There is no necessity for the friends of this Administration, in the midst of this gigantic war still pending, to keep up one continued attempt to attack its own Administration, and to destroy its influence and its power with the people of the country. There is no necessity to make this onslaught upon the free constitution of Louisiana—a free constitution which gives liberty to ninety thousand slaves that the emancipation proclamation did not reach. I undertake to say that it is unnecessary, unfounded, and unjust. I do not say that all the Senators who support this resolution maintain the doctrines contended for by the Senator from Ohio, or the Senator from Kentucky. I understand the Senator from Illinois, who introduces the resolution, to express the wish to avoid the question of the validity of the constitution of Louisiana. In what I have said I do not refer by any means to all Senators here, but I have directed my attention more particularly to the objections taken by the Senator from Kentucky, and the Senator from Ohio, where the two extremes are meeting in one common purpose to attack the Administration and to crucify the free State of Louisiana.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few moments, and only to state my own position on this question.

I regret that debate has occurred as to the existence of the State of Louisiana. I have no doubt that Louisiana is just as much a State in the Union as the State of Ohio. I do not agree with the sentiment of other gentlemen who think that Louisiana by its attempted secession has gone out of the Union, or is out of the pale of the law of the United States; but that is not the question now before the Senate.

The question is, what votes shall be counted at the meeting of the joint convention next Wednesday? What rules shall govern the convention when it meets? Shall the whole thing be postponed until the two Houses get together without any rules or organization, so that confusion will probably occur the very moment the question arises? Upon that question I have very clear convictions, and my convictions upon that point will control my vote.

I alluded incidentally yesterday to the scene that occurred in the joint convention eight years ago. If we do not determine this question now, we know that any member of either House may present it to us in the joint convention. We know that the Senator from Wisconsin, or any other Senator who believes that the vote of Louisiana ought to be counted, may demand that that vote shall be counted. Suppose the Vice President should decide that Louisiana, having been declared in a state of insurrection, cannot vote in the Electoral College: what then? Is his decision final? Is it so that under our system the Vice President may throw out the vote of any one or more States, and his decision be final? Is there no appeal? If there is an appeal, how can it be taken? Suppose the Vice President should reject the vote of the State of Ohio, and I, a representative from that State, should demand that his decision should be reversed: how can it be done? How can any question be taken there?

These difficulties must be met beforehand; and to say that we cannot by law prescribe the mode and manner in which these questions shall be decided before the meeting of the joint convention, is to declare the framers of the Constitution fools. So it seems to me; because if the Vice President should decide in the case I have named that Louisiana is not entitled to vote, the Senator from Wisconsin may demand an appeal from that decision. Who shall decide that appeal? Shall Senators and Representatives vote per capita? Shall they vote by concurrent resolution? If so, then the right of debate grows up. Shall Senators debate? If so, must they debate in the presence of the House of Representatives? How can they vote? All these difficult questions are to be decided.

The honorable Senator from Wisconsin says he has great confidence in the present Vice President; that he is not Mr. Mason. So have I, just as much confidence as he has; but that is not the point. The difficulties are insuperable; and any man, whatever may be his political tenets, may raise the question of difficulty in the presence of the convention, and that convention will be utterly powerless, and will be the laughing-stock of the gallery. In the case I mentioned eight years ago, when there was a totally immaterial question raised in that convention, when the State of Wisconsin was prevented from voting by an unforeseen event, the happening of a great snow storm in the Northwest, and when objection was made to counting the vote of the State of Wisconsin, a debate sprang up, members of the House addressed themselves to "Mr. Speaker," members of the Senate addressed themselves to "Mr. President," the one gentleman recognized one person, and the other gentleman another, without any preliminary understanding as to the form of putting the question, without any preliminary understanding as to who should preside over the joint convention, without any rules for its government.

I say, these same questions of difficulty will present themselves again, and they will be presented by the counting of the vote of the State of Louisiana. Suppose in the joint convention the Vice President shall take up a piece of paper in his hand, a thing that will inevitably occur, and say, "I have here what purports to be the certificate of the State of Louisiana," suppose he should say that the State of Louisiana is in rebellion against the Government; that by the proclamation of the President it is declared to be in a state of insurrection, and that that condition of affairs has been recognized by both Houses of Congress; "I therefore will not allow the vote of Louisiana to be counted in the electoral vote." Suppose he should so decide. The Senator from Wisconsin would object at once.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not at all. He may decide just as he likes; it does not make a bit of difference to me. He may rule it in, or rule it out, and he shall find me making no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Probably my friend from Wisconsin would make no objection, but any member from the House of Representatives or any member of the Senate who is of opinion that the vote of Louisiana ought to be counted, will at once enter his protest, and say that Louisiana has a right to vote. How shall that question be decided? Shall the Vice President decide it, and shall his decision be final? I say not. There must be—

Mr. COLLAMER. Some member of the convention would object to the counting of an illegal vote, because they do not know, officially, what the other votes are.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly not. They cannot tell that until the votes are counted. Suppose the Vice President were to take it into his head to reject the vote of the State of New York; and in a possible case he might reject enough votes to elect General McClellan, a scarcely possible event. We are now prescribing rules and making precedents for history. We cannot expect to travel through many presidential elections in the history of our country with so unanimous a result as at the last, and we are now making a precedent—

Mr. FARWELL. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. SHERMAN. I would prefer to go on and finish what I have to say.

Mr. FARWELL. I was going to ask a single question. Suppose the Vice President does undertake to reject the vote of New York will this resolution settle it, or has that got to be settled in the joint convention?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not suppose this resolution will settle all the questions that may arise. Suppose, on the other hand, the Vice President should believe that Louisiana is a State in the Union, and should decide in favor of the view of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, my colleague would object. I know he would.

Mr. WADE. Mighty quick.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] would say that Louisiana is not in the Union, and therefore the vote must not be counted. If they would not, there are members in the House that would; and how is the question to be decided? Then the joint convention assembled under the Constitution to do the highest act of perpetuating the Government of the United States may find itself in a wrangle; and it is in just such scenes as these that revolutions are born. It was in such scenes as these that Poland witnessed all the struggles which finally led to the destruction of her nationality. In my judgment, therefore, every question that will affect the organization of the joint convention ought to be settled beforehand by some decisive vote; and therefore it is that I am in favor of having this matter decided now.

But I have said that I believed Louisiana was a State in the Union. I have no doubt of it. My views upon that point concur with those of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin; but the question is not whether Louisiana is a State in the Union, but whether Louisiana can now vote in the Electoral College. What is the record? By the proclamation of the President, Louisiana is declared to be in a state of insurrection; by the votes of both Houses of Congress that condition is recognized; all the loyal, legal authority of Louisiana is overthrown, and we have now a provisional governor; we have had military governors in the State of Louisiana, and have now. That is the case presented to us by the record.

But the honorable Senator says that there have been movements made in Louisiana to reorganize the State of Louisiana; that there is a local government now there representing the loyal people of Louisiana. Suppose I admit that fact. Can I tell from the reading of the papers he has read here to-day that that is so? What tribunal has decided that question? He says the President; but I cannot agree with him that the President must decide that question. By the Constitution, each House must decide upon the qualifications of its own members; and I say that no vote can be cast for Louisiana in the Electoral College until she can vote in Congress; and she cannot vote in Congress until the Senate and House of Representatives concur in her voting here. The idea that Louisiana shall vote in the Electoral College and make a President for us when no man can speak for her here, and no man can speak for her in the House of Representatives, is, in my judgment, an absurdity. The very moment that the loyal people of Louisiana shall form a government which is recognized by both branches of Congress and by the President, that moment she will have a right to vote in the Electoral College; and the idea that she should attempt to vote before her condition is fixed by Congress, it seems to me, is wrong.

I do not wish to criticize the action of our friends in Louisiana. I recognize the loyal people who have formed this new movement in Louisiana as loyal and true men. I recognize Louisiana as a State in the Union; but until their action, whatever it is, is approved and sanctioned by Congress with deliberation and premeditation, she ought not to appear here to claim her vote in the Electoral College. That is my judgment; and in saying this I do not assail the President. I think my friend from Wisconsin stated the point too strongly when he said that in voting for this joint resolution we sought to cast censure upon the President.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is not what I said or intended to say. I said that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] in the doctrines he advanced, and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] by responding to him, may join hands together to attack the Administration. I did not say that the resolution was intended for that at all. I was dealing with the doctrines of the Senator's colleague.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I misunderstood the Senator. I have no doubt that the President of the United States may recognize the local tribunals there, and may seek to blend the loyal people of Louisiana into the form of a State government, and I will aid him in doing it; but I must be satisfied that such portion of the people of Louisiana are in a condition to conduct a free government, to found and reorganize or reestablish the State government overthrown by the insurrection. The very moment that is done, I am willing to give their Senators their seats upon this floor; I am willing to give their members seats in the House of Representatives; but until then, their condition is fixed by the proclamation of the President, sanctioned by Congress; and that is, that Louisiana is in a state of insurrection, and until that insurrection is so far overcome as to enable a portion of her people to establish a form of government and the right of suffrage may be protected, she has not a right to representation here, nor to a vote in the Electoral College.

Nor will I now pass judgment upon the question whether her Senators are entitled to seats here. I will hear what they have to say. That question has not yet come up before us. If I am satisfied of some of the facts stated by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, that a majority of the people of Louisiana have taken part in this organization, that they have had an opportunity to vote, and have voted, I will recognize the right of the loyal people of Louisiana to representation here.

I do not, therefore, commit myself upon the question of the right of these Senators to take their seats by my vote on this resolution; but I know, as the case now stands, with the record before us, that Louisiana is declared by law to be in a state of insurrection, and that we have no official decision that she has resumed her place in the Union. We have evidence read from a pamphlet; but we have no decision that she is in the Union and entitled to vote in the Electoral College. I thought, therefore, that the resolution of the House of Representatives—which, I believe, passed there without much objection—when it came here, and was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, was a wise measure to avoid contention and strife, to avoid raising prematurely a question of great difficulty, which ought to be settled so far as the action of the convention was concerned by the deliberate vote of Congress. All the questions that may grow out of the admission of Louisiana I am prepared to decide when the case is fairly argued and discussed before us; but at present I am perfectly clear that the vote of Louisiana, no matter by whom cast, ought not to be counted in the Electoral College, and that we ought now to settle that question, so that it will not trouble the Vice President of the United States when he comes to count this vote. If this resolution is passed, the Vice President, when he comes to these papers, as he must present them to the body, will say, that by the concurrent action of Congress, or of both Houses, which must pass upon the condition of Louisiana, the State of Louisiana is in insurrection and cannot vote in the Electoral College; and that is the end of the matter. I think we ought to assume that responsibility rather than to throw it upon the Vice President.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not rise to protract this discussion. My belief is that the Senate are quite weary of it now, and that it may be brought to a close as well now as any other time. But, sir, I have embodied in a preamble and resolution the views that I have heretofore expressed in relation to this subject, which I desire to submit to the Senate. The recitals in this preamble are what is conceded to be the truth by every Senator; and although it is not in order now, yet my friend from New Jersey shall be satisfied to adopt this amendment, it will be in order if he should withdraw his proposition to strike out the State of Louisiana. I will read the proposition, which I intend to submit at the proper time:

Whereas in pursuance of an act of Congress, approved on the 13th of July, 1861, the President did, on the 15th of August, 1861, declare the inhabitants of certain States, and among others the State of Tennessee and Louisiana, to be in a state of insurrection against the United States; and whereas, with a view to encourage the inhabitants of such States to resume their allegiance to the United States and to reinaugurate loyal State governments, the President did, on the 8th of December, 1863, issue his proclamation whereby it was declared, among other things, that in case a State government should be reestablished in any of said States in the manner therein specified, such government should be recognized as the true government of the State; and whereas the loyal inhabitants of the States of Tennessee and Louisiana, invited so to do by the said last-mentioned proclamation, have in good faith established said State governments loyal to the United States, or attempted so to do; and whereas such loyal inhabitants at the recent presidential election have chosen electors for President and Vice President, who have, in pursuance of the requirements of the Constitution, cast their votes for President and Vice President; and whereas doubts exist as to the validity of such election of presidential electors in the States of Tennessee and Louisiana; and whereas it is well understood that the result of the presidential election could in no way be affected by the votes of said States, whether the same shall be counted or not: Therefore,

Be it resolved, &c., That it is inexpedient to determine the question as to the validity of the election of electors in the said States of Tennessee and Louisiana, and that in counting the votes for President and Vice President, the result should be declared as it would stand if the votes of said States were counted, and also as it would stand if the votes of said States were excluded, such result being the same in either case.

It seems to me that this covers the whole ground; it recites the whole truth in relation to it; it is what no Senator will deny; and it seems to me that for us to go on to vote for anything beyond what is contained in this proposition, is to vote for the merest abstraction in the world. It is to anticipate a question which may possibly arise but which will probably never arise in the history of this country. I hope to have an opportunity to present this proposition, and I shall ask the vote of the Senate upon it.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] seemed to think that he had made a most happy and striking comparison. He commenced his speech by comparing the Senator from Ohio and myself to Herod and Pontius Pilate, and about the center of his speech he repeated the comparison, and at the very close he announced it for the third time. Hence I come to the conclusion that he thinks it a very powerful statement. I think I understand the Senator's tactics perfectly well when he tries to amaze the Senate by the statement that extremes have met; that the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] and myself agree on this measure. The Senator from Wisconsin but resorts to one of the artful dodges that are sometimes resorted to by some speakers who have been not inaptly called demagogues—I do not apply that term to the honorable Senator, however—when they wish to excite the prejudices of the crowd. I do not think the honorable Senator can, by that kind of dodge, affect the vote of any Senator on either side of the Chamber. I am sure no Senator on this side of the Chamber—and when I use that term I mean the Democrats and Conservatives that are here—can be driven from what he conceives to be his duty because he has the assistance of the Senator from Ohio; and I am certain that there is no Senator on the other side whose intelligence is so low, whose mind could be so governed by his prejudices, that he will be driven from his position because some members on this side advocate a proposition of which he is in favor.

I do not know whether the honorable Senator intended to liken me to Herod or to Pilate; but he said that the two Senators, the one from Kentucky and the other from Ohio, like Herod and Pilate, desired to crucify this young free State of Louisiana. I was not aware before that Herod had much to do with the crucifixion. I knew that Pontius Pilate judged on that occasion, and his judgments have been decreed infamous. However, I shall make no defense of the Senator from Ohio; he is in the Senate, and is fully able to defend himself. But, sir, if the comparison should be applied to anybody, the Senator from Wisconsin ought to apply it to the Executive and to General Banks. It is they, if anybody—and I will not charge that they desire to crucify the free State of Louisiana.

Herod and Pontius Pilate were wicked and cruel aggressors upon the civil and divine rights of the people. I, sir, resist the aggressions of usurping officials; the Senator is their advocate. Had I lived in Judea in the day of Herod, I would have denounced the cruel and bloody decrees of that wicked king as I do here arraign the President for his usurpations, his violations of the Constitution, and his assaults upon the civil liberties of the people. I would have denounced in the harshest language the infamous judgments of Pontius Pilate, the governor, as I do the unlawful, wicked, and unconstitutional military orders of General Banks. Judging from the Senator's course here, had he lived in the day of Herod and Pontius Pilate, they would have found in him an able and zealous advocate.

Perhaps my views of a free State are a little more expansive than those of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin. I regard a State free that is governed by the laws made by the sovereign people of that State without the dictation of presidents or major generals. I regard that State as a free State which is governed by law, knowing that there is no freedom save in the supremacy of the law. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin in his contracted view seems to suppose a State is free, provided no African is held in slavery. May not white men in Louisiana be kept in chains as well as black men? I confess I have more sympathy for the white than I have for the black race. Not so with the honorable Senator. He is willing that the decrees of the Executive and the orders of General Banks shall go forth to alter the constitution of the people of Louisiana, and prescribe the qualifications of their electors and of candidates for office, and to hold the white men of Louisiana in slavish submission to those decrees; and he calls a State so formed and so conducted a free State, merely because its constitution indicates that involuntary servitude shall not exist there. Away, sir, with such a free State! It is the veriest slavery, slavery of your own race, slavery of your own kin, slavery of your own kin. It is a striking down of every principle of republican liberty for the purpose of elevating a few miserable Africans.

The Senator from Ohio and myself are in accord on this matter. He desires to vindicate the right of the people of Louisiana, in the exercise of their own sovereign power, to decree their own form of government, unbiased, uninfluenced by outside dictation; whether from the Executive Mansion or from the headquarters of a major general. The Senator from Wisconsin takes the very converse of that position. He is amazed that the Senator from Ohio should advocate these propositions, but he is not at all astonished at the course of the Senator from Kentucky, because the Senator from Ohio is for freedom, and the Senator from Kentucky is opposed to emancipation. I do not know what right he has to say that I am opposed to emancipation by those who have the power to decree emancipation. I am not opposed to the people of the State of Louisiana or Georgia or any other State of this Union declaring, if in their sovereign capacity they choose in a legal and formal manner to decree, that they will have no slavery existing there. Nor should I be opposed to the people of the State of Wisconsin, if they choose so to decree in the exercise of their sovereign power, declaring that slavery should exist there. These are matters that are left by our fundamental law to the people of each State; and, when they exercise the power in the manner prescribed by their constitution and laws, it is a matter of their own concernment, and will receive no opposition from me.

If, however, the Senator means that I am opposed to the amendment of the Constitution of the United States on that subject, he is right. I was opposed to that amendment of the Constitution when it was pending in this body. I spoke against it and I voted against it; and I think the day will come when the Senator himself will regret that faithless act. What is that act? It decrees that millions upon millions of property held under the constitutions and laws of the States by virtue of the Constitution of the United States shall be taken from the owners without compensation. I regard that as nothing else than bad faith and legislative robbery. The Senator may regard it as he pleases. Regarding it as I do, I am opposed to it. I hold that by that amendment you overturn the whole system of our Federal Government, because if there is one characteristic feature of this form of government it is that the States are at liberty to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, and you have as much right to amend the Constitution so as to regulate the condition of master and slave as you have to amend it in regard to the regulation of the relation of husband and wife, guardian and ward, parent and child, and no more. If you have a right to pass that constitutional amendment, you have a right to decree that this shall be an empire or a kingly form of government. It is destructive of the system, in my judgment. I think it is in bad faith. I think it overthrows and disregards vested property rights. I fear that the day will come when, in view of our vast and accumulating debt, some demagogues will desire to repudiate it. I never expect to be of that number, but when that is done, and you rich men of the North shall talk about property rights and the faith of the Government pledged to pay its debt, they can be told that by legislative enactment, by constitutional amendment this vast amount of property was destroyed in the slave States without compensation to the owners, and their mouths will be stopped.

But, Mr. President, enough of such matters. I will say to the Senator, that if the people of any State in the Union choose to abrogate slavery in their own way, it is their matter, not mine. I have a right to speak on that subject in no State of this Union but one, and that is the Commonwealth of Kentucky, and there I have been opposed to emancipation.

But, sir, the Senator tells us that General Banks's statements are all true, and that the statement of the Senator from Ohio and myself, that there was military interference with the election, has no foundation in truth. Let us bring the honorable Senator to the facts on that point, and see who is in error. Who has the right to prescribe the qualifications of voters in a State of this Union? There is not a Senator in this Chamber who will not answer, the people of that State. That is the very foundation of your republican representative form of government. What power has the President, what power has Major General Banks, to prescribe the qualifications of a voter in Louisiana? Tell me not, sir, that there has been no military interference with the elections in that State, when the Executive and the military commander of that department have prescribed the qualifications of voters. Make me a major general, and clothe me with the power to prescribe the qualification of voters, and if I had a hundred followers in the State of New York, I could carry that Empire State by prescribing such qualifications as would exclude all but those on my side. The Senator sees that; he knows it; he cannot deny it, and yet he says there was no military interference. I was astonished that a Senator, usually so candid and fair in his statements to the Senate, should allow his judgment to be so warped by his zeal as to maintain for a moment that there had been no military interference with the elections in Louisiana.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. With the Senator's permission, I will say that I stated precisely wherein and to what extent I understood the order of General Banks to have affected the elective franchise, by directing, what the constitution of Louisiana did not direct, that the soldiers who were citizens of Louisiana enlisted in the Army might be permitted to vote; and that of the whole number of those citizens in the Army there were only eight hundred and eight who voted, while the total number of votes cast was eleven thousand four hundred and fourteen.

Mr. POWELL. So far as the principle is concerned it does not matter if there was but one; it was an infamous usurpation; and I speak of it as infamous because it violates the Constitution of the country.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection to the Senator drawing his own inferences; but he seems to express the idea that I had maintained that there was nothing done under the military authority. I stated expressly, as I mean always to state, the facts as I understood them.

Mr. POWELL. Here is the constitutional provision on the subject of the qualification of electors: "The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." That is the only clause of the Constitution on the subject. Was that constitutional test applied to the electors in Louisiana? It certainly was not in more instances than that admitted by the honorable Senator.

In the statement of General Banks, which I hold in my hand, he admits that he altered the constitution of Louisiana concerning the qualifications of voters so far as to permit soldiers and sailors in the public service to vote. What right had Nathaniel P. Banks, major general of the United States Army, to lay his hand upon the constitution of the State of Louisiana? When he did it he committed a usurpation and violated the law, and so far from being lauded he should be censured in the harshest possible terms.

But that is not all. General Banks says, in this paper, that everybody who was registered and voted in Louisiana took the oath prescribed in the President's amnesty proclamation of December 8, 1863. Now, let us see what was the oath contained in that amnesty proclamation:

"I, ———, do solemnly swear, in the presence of Almighty God, that I will henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and the union of the States thereunder; and that I will, in like manner, abide by and faithfully support all acts of Congress passed during the existing rebellion with reference to slaves, so long and so far as not repealed, modified, or held void by Congress, or by decision of the Supreme Court; and that I will, in like manner, abide by and faithfully support all proclamations of the President made during the existing rebellion having reference to slaves, so long and so far as not modified or declared void by decision of the Supreme Court. So help me God."

After having prescribed the oath, that proclamation goes on to declare:

"And I do further proclaim, declare, and make known that whenever, in any of the States of Arkansas, Texas,

Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, and North Carolina, a number of persons, not less than one tenth in number of the votes cast in such State at the presidential election of the year of our Lord 1860, each having taken the oath aforesaid and not having since violated it, and being a qualified voter by the election law of the State existing immediately before the so-called act of secession, and excluding all others, shall re-establish a State government which shall be republican, and in nowise contravening said oath, such shall be recognized as the true government of the State, and the State shall receive thereunder the benefits of the constitutional provision which declares that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and, on application of the Legislature, or the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence."

The President in his proclamation says that if one tenth of the voters shall take the amnesty oath, they may form a State government, and those taking the oath shall be qualified voters, and that they alone shall be voters who were qualified voters under the constitution and laws of Louisiana as they existed before the rebellion. General Banks in his order has violated the proclamation of the President. The President's proclamation says that the government may be formed by persons "each having taken the oath aforesaid, and not having since violated it, and being a qualified voter by the election law of the State existing immediately before the so-called act of secession, and excluding all others."

Does General Banks exclude all others? Does he not allow soldiers and sailors to vote? He does. He extends and adds to the President's proclamation prescribing the oath; he enlarges it. All the President requires is that this oath be taken; and that makes a man a qualified voter, provided he was otherwise a qualified voter under the laws of Louisiana. I admit that the requisition of this oath was usurpation; but General Banks enlarges even upon that. The President says that this oath shall be sufficient; but General Banks goes further and says that the soldiers and sailors may vote. Under the President's proclamation they could not vote, being prohibited by the constitution of Louisiana, but General Banks allowed them to vote.

Is it compatible with the Senator's notions of a free State that one tenth of the qualified voters, provided they take a humiliating oath which would degrade them in many respects, shall legislate for the nine tenths? The one tenth fixed by the President is one tenth of the qualified voters, as they were by the State constitution and laws before the rebellion; that is, one tenth of the white people over twenty-one years of age entitled to vote under the constitution of the State, excluding Sambo. The population of the State of Louisiana is about equally divided between whites and blacks, and the Senator advocates the proposition that one tenth of the voters of the white race, and a bare majority of that one tenth, shall form a government for all the other people of the State; and because the Senator from Ohio and myself choose to resist that most anti-republican feature, to resist this tyrannical encroachment on the rights of the people, we are to be likened to Herod and Pontius Pilate crucifying a free State. Was there ever such a monstrous utterance?

I suppose that if the Senator from Ohio and I were to oppose the admission or recognition of a State formed by one twentieth of the legal voters the Senator from Wisconsin would think we were trying to crucify a free State. Why, sir, if there ever were sentiments uttered that crucified free States and free republican governments, they are to be found in the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin in defense of the usurpations of the President and of General Banks. These are the sentiments of crucifixion complete; there is nothing left for the Senator from Ohio and myself to crucify. The Senator from Wisconsin has crucified and utterly destroyed the great principles that underlie civil liberty; he has killed every principle of civil liberty; he has become the advocate of the tyrannies and usurpations of the Executive and Major General Banks. He supports the act of the President in prescribing the qualifications of voters in the States, and declaring that if one tenth of them take the oath he prescribes they shall have power to establish a government to rule over the nine tenths. The Senator is the advocate of those who commit these usurpations, and he denounces those who oppose them as Pilates and Herods.

In my judgment the decree of Pontius Pilate was a great wrong, that of Herod was cruel. The latter was that all the children of Bethlehem under two years of age should be destroyed; but infamous as the decree of Herod was, it is not half so infamous as the principles advocated by the Senator from Wisconsin, for that affected but individuals; it took the lives of tender infants, who, if they died, under his Christian code the Senator would believe went directly to heaven; but the Senator crucifies free States, and puts under his iron heel every principle that underlies a free Commonwealth; and after murdering those principles he denounces those of us who in our humble way resist, as Pilates and Herods. He, in my judgment—I say it with great deference—has out-Heroded Herod. If anybody should be called Herod or Pontius Pilate, I think it is those who govern affairs as they are governed in Louisiana. The Senator tells us that one half of the whole population of Louisiana at the time the war began, whites and blacks, have gone under the sod—are dead. The population of the State of Louisiana in 1860 was about seven hundred thousand souls. Under the policy of these rulers you have killed about four hundred thousand of those people. One half of all the negroes there, the Senator says, are dead. Instead of attending to Sambo, such has been your policy that you have put about two hundred thousand of the sable people of that State under the sod. The decree of Herod was not half so cruel as that, because it only took the children under two years of age; and here you take not only them, but you take blooming virgins and the young men in stalwart youth, and the aged, decrepit, and infirm, and you sweep them all away with one remorseless blow.

Now, sir, I think I have disposed of King Herod, and I come to look at the Pontius Pilate part of the proceeding. I do not know whether the Senator from Wisconsin intended to liken me to Herod or to Pilate. I told the Senator from Ohio that he might take either; if he thought he was likened to Pilate, he might defend Pilate, and if he thought I was likened to Herod, I would stand on that. He stated he did not care a toss of the copper which. [Laughter.] How is it that the Senator from Ohio and myself have been likened to Pontius Pilate sitting in judgment upon this matter? We have not judged at all; we are now in the council chamber; but I will tell the Senator who did sit in judgment upon that free State. It was the President and Major General Banks. It was they who violated the fundamental principle of constitutional and civil liberty. It was they who put the knife to the throat of that free State. When I speak of a free State here I speak of the initiatory measure to form a government for the State to come back into the Union, although I believe she never was out.

The first bulletin that was issued from the executive chamber on the subject, declared that if one tenth of the qualified voters would take the prescribed oath which I have recited, they might form a State government. What was that oath? Not alone that they should be true and faithful to the Constitution and laws of the Union, but that they would support all the laws and resolves passed by Congress, and all the proclamations that had been issued by the President on the subject of slavery since the beginning of the rebellion, and not only that, but that they would support all proclamations on that subject which the President might hereafter issue. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin, would he so lower his manhood, would he so far debase himself as to go and crouch at the footstool of executive power and take that oath before being admitted to the rights of a free-born citizen? Would he take the oath to support proclamations which might afterward be issued? That would be swearing in the dark, as they say out West, and no honest man would do it; yet that was the requirement of the President. That was the first ukase which was issued to murder the great principles of civil and republican liberty in Louisiana. That was received there, and then General Banks issued his ukase and he set aside a clause of the constitution of Louisiana which the President in his proclamation allowed to stand and be in full force concerning voters, and that was, that soldiers and sailors in the service should vote, when it was declared in the constitution of Louisiana that they should not vote. Banks found that the President had not carried the thing far enough, and he, too, must not only carry out the unconstitutional edicts of the White House, but he must make an unconstitutional edict of his own, which he did, by proclaiming that soldiers and sailors, who were not qualified voters by the constitution of Louisiana, should be qualified voters.

That is the attitude in which General Banks and the President stand, and the Senator from Wisconsin is their advocate. He denounces the Senator from Ohio and myself because we resist this usurpation. I am willing for myself to receive the fulminations of the Senator from now until doomsday. While I am so intrenched in the right I fear not the assaults of the Senator, no matter how strong his armor, how keen his cimeter, for the blows will fall harmless at my feet; the truth will be my protection; the advocacy of just and correct principles my shield.

But, sir, General Banks did more. I did not intend to criticize that learned statesman and, as I have no doubt the honorable Senator from Wisconsin would say, able general. He issued a proclamation concerning this subject. I regret that I have not that proclamation here; but I have an extract from it, which I will read to the Senate:

"Opinion is free, and candidates are numerous. Open hostilities cannot be permitted. Indifference will be treated as a crime, and faction as treason."

That is the proclamation of this most worthy Solon, General Banks—indifference will be treated as a crime and punished with an iron hand. If a man, after submitting himself to these humiliating conditions and having taken this oath, refuses to vote, General Banks says he will treat that as a crime. Was there ever a more atrocious sentiment uttered in a free Government? The reason why General Banks put that clause in his proclamation is obvious. He knew that not even one tenth of the voters of Louisiana, if left unbiased, would come up to vote at his election the way he wished them to vote; and hence he said, All that have taken the oath and are thus qualified shall vote, and if you do not vote, your indifference will be treated as a crime. A more atrocious sentiment was never uttered, and yet the Senator from Wisconsin says that is a free election where the major general commanding says who shall be entitled to suffrage, and further says that all entitled to suffrage who do not vote shall be treated as criminals and punished. He put the iron heel on them.

Is that what the Senator calls freedom of election? There was not a scintilla of freedom in the whole matter; and when General Banks announces, in the statement which has been read, that there was less interference by Government authority in that election than perhaps in the election in any State in the Union, he never made a more erroneous statement. He must have known that it was not true. Suppose that the major general in command of the military forces in the Senator's State should undertake to prescribe the qualifications of voters in Wisconsin, and the qualifications so established by him were different from those prescribed by the constitution and laws of the State, and, in addition to that, he should issue a decree that those who did not vote, that all who exhibited indifference, should be treated as criminals and punished with an iron hand, would the Senator think there was much freedom of election there?

General Banks thought he would make a great reputation by bringing back Louisiana into the Union, and giving his friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, a chance to make assaults on others for their attempts to crucify the young, free State of Louisiana. The general had made several efforts, in a military point of view, without winning many laurels. I believe that if General Banks had devoted himself as assiduously to his military duties, and to fighting armed rebels, as he did to controlling elections, and issuing ukases on that subject, he would not have met with the disaster which he encountered on Red river. I hope I am mistaken in this opinion; but I think that if he had had more love for the glory of great achievements in arms, and less for political trickery, and less hankering after cotton, he would not have been so disastrously and disgracefully defeated as he was on the Red river. His vocation, it seems, was twofold. Being a politician of some success, he thought he could run the political machine best; and he did run it, and he ran it with a vengeance. He ran it over, and destroyed every principle of republican liberty.

Let me tell the Senator that we are not to be driven from our advocacy of the right by being likened to Pontius Pilate or to Herod. We will do what we believe is right. We will meet him in the argument on every point. Let him prove to the Senate that the President or General Banks had any power under the Constitution, under our system of government, to prescribe the qualifications of voters and of candidates for office in the States. Unless he can do that they must stand confessed, in his own judgment, as usurpers. I use the word usurpers to indicate those who administer the functions of their offices in violation of law. It was a maxim of the Athenians, the wisest of the ancient commonwealths, that all who administered the functions of their office in violation of law were usurpers. It is in that sense that I use the term. However good their intentions may have been, I say that in their exercise of power in Louisiana they overthrew the Constitution and laws of their country which they had sworn to support; and hence, in my judgment, they are technically usurpers.

While we are not to be driven from our position, I think nobody is going to be dismayed or deterred from doing their duty by the Senator announcing here that extremes have met. I would to God that we could have more frequent meetings of the extremes. The Senator from Ohio and myself are regarded as on the extreme verge of opposite opinions here. I am willing, whenever the Senator from Ohio draws his sword and makes a charge on those who are overthrowing the dearest rights of the people, and destroying the constitutional liberty of the citizen, to fight under his banner; and, sir, he is a sturdy old leader.

I was gratified when the Senator from Ohio made his manly speech on this subject. I am willing to fight under his banner, and I will follow him to the fight when the Senator from Wisconsin and the Executive and major generals make crusades against the civil liberties of the people. I differ from the Senator from Ohio upon many subjects; but there is a blunt honesty and manhood and candor about him which I admire. He is unlike the Senator from Wisconsin in one thing. While his philanthropy and his love of freedom are most expansive, I believe more so than my own, for I do not think the negroes are going to be near as well off free as they are in slavery, while he wants them free, and goes even as far as the Senator from Wisconsin on that point, he has a just appreciation of the constitutional and civil liberties of the white man. He is willing to fight for the liberties of the white man. Just at that point, however, the Senator from Wisconsin falls off, and goes off with a sickly sentimentality for the woolly-headed negro, and cares nothing for "the poor white trash" of Louisiana. The Senator from Ohio stands manfully in the breach when their rights are assailed. When he defends the poor downtrodden white man of Louisiana, he defends the people of the whole land. It is their common defense against those who assail the great principles of constitutional and civil liberty. We will stand to our guns on that point, notwithstanding the denunciations of the Senator from Wisconsin, and we will fight the battle out and will not surrender. As I have enlisted under the Senator from Ohio in this fight, I am not for yielding, and I do not think he is for yielding, and we both, I believe, are animated by honest convictions to defend the white people of the country against those who seek to overthrow their constitutional and civil liberties, and I believe we will do battle to the very end; and I trust and hope we may conquer and overthrow all the enemies of constitutional and civil liberty. So long as the Senator from Ohio is engaged defending the constitutional and civil liberties of the white man, he will find me a faithful ally.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I am not going to prolong this debate by attempting a reply to the position assumed by the Senator from Wisconsin in his excited remarks this morning. We have had everything brought into the debate. The Administration has been defeated when nobody has assailed it. Pontius Pilate and Herod have been assailed and defended. We have had a general discussion about reconstruction, and an excited debate upon a question which it seems to me should have called for no excitement; and all I have to say to the Senate now is to appeal to its members that, however much they may be disposed to crucify over again Pilate or Herod or the free State of Louisiana, they will not crucify us here by bringing in all these extraneous circumstances and prolonging this debate. I think every Senator understands the question. All we wish to settle is to determine whether, on Wednesday next, when the canvass of the votes for President and Vice President takes place, the votes from the States unrepresented in Congress, in a condition of rebellion against the Government, into which goods are not permitted to go, with whom we have no friendly intercourse, shall be counted as votes cast for President and Vice President of the United States. We neither determine that those States are in the Union or out of the Union.

That is the question; and I appeal to Senators to let us vote upon it. Business is pressing; the chairman of the Committee on Finance is urgent with his bills. I think every Senator understands this question. Although I have no doubt every Senator could reply to all that has been said inconsistent with the views he himself entertains, if all will forego the making of those replies, we may have the vote, and settle the question. I trust that course will be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, to strike out "Louisiana" from the preamble.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I beg leave to say that my colleague [Mr. Hicks] is confined to his room by sickness, and has been for the last two or three days.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wiley—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Foster, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Chandler, Foot, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Hicks, McDougall, Nye, Richardson, Riddle, Stewart, and Wilson—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Is it in order to move to strike out the preamble?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I make that motion, and I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Kansas will observe that if the preamble is stricken out the resolution will be unmeaning, and we shall then have to put into the resolution the names of the States. To strike out the preamble and do no more would leave the resolution unmeaning.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to have the preamble and resolution read.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from Illinois will modify the preamble by using the words "in such a condition," instead of "in a state of rebellion," the preamble will not be objectionable to me.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to that if the Senator makes the motion; but I have no authority to make the modification.

Mr. POMEROY. As it is in order to modify the preamble before the question is taken on striking it out, I move to amend it by substituting the words "such a condition" instead of "state of rebellion."

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is in the part of the preamble which was amended on the report of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SUMNER. As I understand it, the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is not now in order; he proposes to amend words which have been voted into the preamble on the motion of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If that be the case the amendment is not in order.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator may make his motion at another stage.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I asked the Chair if my motion was not in order, and he announced that it was.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator was to strike out the preamble to the resolution, upon which the Senate had not voted; but an amendment to alter words which the Senate have already inserted is not in order.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I suppose I can make my motion at a future time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's motion is in order. It is the amendment of his colleague which is out of order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is it in order to strike out a preamble which, if stricken out, will leave an unmeaning resolution? By looking at the resolution you will find that it refers to the preamble, and if you strike out the preamble the resolution will have no meaning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to strike out is clearly in order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to the preamble being stricken out, but I will not vote to strike out the preamble, if it is to leave an unmeaning resolution. If the Senator from Kansas prefers that the preamble be stricken out and will at the same time propose to alter the resolution so that it will read, "that the States of Virginia, North Carolina," &c., instead of the words "the States mentioned in the preamble," I shall have no objection to his motion; but I cannot consent to strike out the preamble and leave an unmeaning resolution. I presume he himself would not desire that.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." I propose, if the preamble be stricken out, to offer then to amend the resolution to meet my own views on the subject.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope then it will not be stricken out.

Mr. SUMNER. I will simply observe that the motion of the Senator from Kansas, if it prevailed, would make nonsense of the resolution. I think, therefore, we had better vote against it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Will not the resolution be in the hands of the Senate for amendment, if the preamble be stricken out? My object is to have the resolution amended to suit my own views.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. LANE of Kansas, by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Doolittle, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wiley—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Farwell, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Powell, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Wilson, and Wright—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Collamer, Foot, Harding, Hicks, McDougall, Richardson, and Riddle—9.

So the Senate refused to strike out the preamble.

Mr. COLLAMER. I now offer my amendment to strike out the preamble and the whole of the resolution except the resolving clause, and to insert:

That the people of no State, the inhabitants whereof have been declared in a state of insurrection by virtue of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved July 13, 1861, shall be regarded as empowered to elect electors of President and Vice President of the United States until said condition of insurrection shall cease, and be so declared by virtue of the law of the United States; nor shall any vote cast by any such electors elected by the votes of the inhabitants of any such State, or the Legislature thereof, be received or counted.

Mr. HARRIS. I propose to amend that amendment by substituting what I sent to the Chair.

Mr. COLLAMER. Before the amendment of the Senator from New York is read, I desire to modify my amendment, at the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] by inserting the words "or until they shall be represented in both Houses of Congress," after the clause relative to the condition of insurrection having ceased and been so declared by virtue of a law of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's amendment will be so modified. The question now is on amending the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, by striking it all out and inserting the substitute proposed by the Senator from New York, which will be read.

The words proposed to be inserted by Mr. HARRIS were read, as follows:

Whereas in pursuance of an act of Congress approved on the 13th day of July, 1861, the President did, on the 16th day of August, 1861, declare the inhabitants of certain States, and among others the States of Tennessee and Louisiana, to be in a state of insurrection against the United States; and whereas, with a view to encourage the inhabitants of such States to resume their allegiance to the United States and to reinaugurate loyal State governments, the President, on the 8th day of December, 1863, issued his proclamation, whereby it was declared, among other things, that in case a State government should be reestablished in any of said States, in a manner therein specified, such government should be recognized as the true government of the State; and whereas the loyal inhabitants of the States of Tennessee and Louisiana, invited so to do by the said last-mentioned proclamation, have in good faith established State governments loyal to the United States, or attempted so to do; and whereas such loyal inhabitants at the recent presidential election have chosen electors of President and Vice President, who have, in pursuance of the requirement of the Constitution, cast their votes for the President and Vice President; and whereas doubts exist as to the validity of such election of presidential electors in the said States of Tennessee and Louisiana; and whereas it is well understood that the result of the presidential election could in no way be affected by the votes of the said States, whether the same be counted or not: Therefore,

Be it resolved, &c., That it is inexpedient to determine the question as to the validity of the election of electors in the said States of Tennessee and Louisiana; and that in counting the votes for President and Vice President the result be declared as it would stand if the votes of the said States were counted, and also as it would stand if the votes of the said States were excluded, such result being the same in either case.

Mr. WILSON. There is a statement of fact in that proposition which I think is not a fact, and that is, that the State of Tennessee has established a loyal State government. There has been no State government established there, though I am told one will go into operation on the 4th of March.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We all understand the question. Let her vote.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Donnell, Farwell, Harris, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wiley—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Powell, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Wilson, and Wright—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Foot, Harding, Hicks, McDougall, Richardson, and Riddle—8.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The practical effect of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont is the same as that of the resolution which has passed the House of Representatives. Under the operation of the amendment the electoral votes from the States named in the House resolution will be excluded, so that practically there is no difference between them as to the effect in canvassing the votes on Wednesday next. The Senator's amendment, however, goes a little further; it has the advantage of being a general proposition, as the Senator thinks; but when you come to scan it, it has no advantage in that respect, because you have to look to the proclamation to construe the Senator's amendment to find what States are declared in insurrection, and then the States are named; they are named in the proclamation just as they are named in the preamble of the House resolution, so that you come right around to the same place. The practical effect is precisely the same. There is this difference, however, between the propositions: the Senator's proposition is not limited to the case now in hand; if the rebellion should continue four years longer and until another presidential election is held, it would be in the power of the President of the United States, by a proclamation, to declare any State in the Union to be in a state of insurrection, and to prevent its voting at a presidential election. He could issue his proclamation and declare the State of New York, or any other State, to be in a state of insurrection; and under the amendment her vote could not be counted. I do not think it well to go further than the occasion requires. That is one suggestion that I make in reference to it.

Another is this: the House of Representatives have originated and passed this resolution; and unless something is to be gained by a change of its language it is not desirable to change it. The Committee on the Judiciary had this resolution before them, and although perhaps they would have preferred some change in it, they made none. The committee considered it carefully and recommended the Senate to adopt the resolution as it came from the House. They did propose a change in the preamble because they thought it would commit the Senate to a fact which some members of the committee desired not to be committed to. As it passed the House of Representatives, the preamble stated that these States, naming them, continued in a state of armed rebellion for three years, and were in such condition of rebellion on the 8th of November last. There was some dispute as to that among the members of the committee; and to avoid that, that portion of the preamble was recommended to be stricken out, but the resolution itself was not interfered with.

Now, sir, inasmuch as the House has sent us the resolution in this form, inasmuch as the practical effect of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont will be precisely the same as that of the resolution the House have sent us, I think we had better adhere to the House resolution and the report of the Committee on the Judiciary. If the House had sent the proposition to us in this form, instead of the form in which they have sent it, I do not know but that I should have preferred to take that. As the question is now before us, and there is one objection that may properly lie against the substitute, I think we had best adhere to the report of the committee on the House resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have an objection to the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Vermont, and I do not think I could vote for it if the proposition had come in that form from the House of Representatives. The act of July, 1861, does not state that there are any particular States in rebellion; it names no State at all. It only provides that when the President shall think that a state of insurrection exists he may proceed under the act of 1795 and declare that State to be in a state of rebellion.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is not it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think that is it substantially. I do not think I can be mistaken about it; but if I am mistaken as to that, I am certainly right in saying that that act does not name any particular State in rebellion. [Mr. COLLAMER nodded assent.] So far, the honorable member admits that I am correct in my recollection. Then they have been placed in the condition which the honorable member supposes would deprive them of the right of electing electors, by virtue of the President's proclamation issued under the authority of that act. We have left it to him, therefore, to say what States are to be considered as States in rebellion; and the proposition of the honorable member is that any States which he may have declared to be in a state of rebellion are to be considered, with reference to the power of electing electors, as remaining in rebellion until Congress by act shall declare otherwise, or until the members elected from such States as Senators and Representatives shall have been admitted by both branches. That I understand.

Now, as I think—and I believe that is the opinion of the honorable member himself—these States have never been, in a constitutional sense, out of the Union; and they are to be considered, therefore, with reference to our power over them, as States in the Union. My idea is that if the President, by his proclamation issued in pursuance of the act of 1861, can deprive them of the right of electing electors, it is only because they are to be considered as in a state of rebellion; and if he can place them in a state of rebellion, why can he not say that that rebellion is terminated? Suppose the President had, by a proclamation issued before the 8th of November, announced to the country that the war, as against Tennessee, for example, was not to be carried on because the rebellion in Tennessee was put an end to; she was to be considered as in the Union. If my friend's amendment is the proper course to be pursued, she would not have been authorized to elect electors. According to that view, her authority to elect at any time afterwards would depend upon the happening of one or two facts; either that Congress should have passed a law admitting Tennessee into the Union, or declaring that the rebellion in Tennessee was terminated, or upon the fact that, in the absence of such act of Congress, Tennessee had elected Representatives and Senators, and each branch had received the members elected to that branch.

Now, Mr. President, suppose the President of the United States had declared that the rebellion in Tennessee was at an end, or, to put it stronger, suppose he had issued a proclamation before the 8th of November stating, and the fact was so, that the war had ceased in each one of those States who were declared by his proclamation issued under the authority of the act of 1861 to be in a state of rebellion; suppose we all knew that; suppose every Senator here was satisfied that the President's proclamation was true in point of fact, that the war had terminated, that the authority of the United States in these States was restored; and just as effectually as it existed before the rebellion was inaugurated, and Senators from those States had come here properly appointed by the Legislatures of the States; are we prepared to say that we would not receive them unless the other House should have received the members, or would the other House be willing to exclude members elected under such circumstances until the Senate should have declared that it would receive the Senators elected under the same circumstances? My idea is that all that is necessary in order to entitle those States to be represented; either in the Electoral College or in Congress, is the fact that at the time the members are elected to one House or Senators are appointed to the other, the rebellion should have then terminated; and that peace should have been restored; the authority of the Constitution reinstated.

If I am not right as to that, it is because the opinion which I stated just now (and in which I believe the Senator from Vermont concurs, to a certain extent at any rate) is erroneous. Are the States out of the Union? I say they are not. If the States are still in the Union, just as much a part of the United States as they ever were—a position demonstrated by the fact that we are carrying on the war in order to force them to yield upon the hypothesis that they are in the Union—if that proposition is right, that the States are in the Union, it must be true, as I think, that they have a right to elect Representatives and Senators the moment the contingency has happened that puts an end to the obstacle which, as long as it continued, deprived them of the authority to elect; that is to say, on the termination of the rebellion. If my friend is right Tennessee may have yielded, every man in it may have yielded long before the 8th of November; all the courts of the United States may have been again organized; the whole authority may have been reinstated; and yet she would not be entitled to appoint Senators or to elect Representatives until Congress should declare that the rebellion was ended as to her, or until both Houses should agree to receive Senators and Representatives. Now, I submit to my friend from Vermont that if he concurs with me in thinking that these States are now in the Union, a proposition like that is notoriously in conflict with that opinion; and I hope, therefore, with due deference to the better judgment of the honorable member who moves the amendment, that it may not be adopted, but that on the contrary we shall adopt the proposition as it came from the House of Representatives and as it stands amended by the report of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, I understand that this resolution, as passed by the House of Representatives, has already been amended in the Senate on the recommendation of the Committee on the Judiciary. Then it must go back to the House of Representatives for action. Having already been amended by the Senate, it will have to receive action again in the other House, and the amendment which I propose, if adopted, will not alter that condition. There is, therefore, no objection to my amendment on that ground.

In the act of 1861 Congress did not attempt to declare any particular State to be in a condition of war or insurrection. That act was drawn with care, and was intended to be so. It states a condition of things, and declares that when that condition of things arises in any State, in that contingency the President may issue his proclamation declaring the inhabitants of that State to be in a condition of insurrection, and thereupon the consequences are to ensue which are stated in the act, the consequences of a state of war. Congress alone under our Constitution has the power to declare war, and therefore Congress alone is to define what shall be a condition of war with any of our own States. In fact, there may be a war of our own States against the Government, as we have experienced sadly, and of course, therefore, there may be a war of the Government against them. I say Congress is to declare when that condition of circumstances exists; and Congress did it in the act of 1861.

I dislike the proposition contained in this House resolution, because by it Congress undertakes to exercise the power of declaring now, and in relation to a pending election, that the votes of particular States, by name, shall not be counted, because those States are in a condition of insurrection. I dislike to undertake to legislate for a State by name particularly, as I have before stated to the Senate. I want a general law on the subject. The act of 1861 was a general law by which all States were subjected to its operation in the same contingency. It seems to me that Congress, who defined in the act of 1861 what should be a condition of things which would put the inhabitants of a State in a state of insurrection against the Government, can alone define and decide upon that condition of things which shall restore a State to its allegiance. The decision must be by the same body, the same power. I know in relation to foreign nations that if we have a war with them declared by Congress, the President, with the concurrence of two thirds of the Senate, may make a treaty of peace; but even in that case, there is the intervention and the exercise of power by one branch of Congress, the legislative department. But it seems that some gentlemen imagine that when we have made a law declaring the circumstances and contingencies which shall create a condition of insurrection and war on the part of States against the General Government, that condition may cease by the decision of the Executive, without any intervention of the power which created it. That does not seem to me to be so. A treaty of peace cannot be made with the insurrectionary States. The President cannot negotiate a treaty of peace with Mr. Davis or anybody in the South. No such treaty can ever come before the Senate. If you treat with them, you acknowledge their power as a nation; you acknowledge them as an independent power. No such treaty ever can be made. The declaration made by the act of 1861, which the Supreme Court of the United States has decided amounted to a declaration of war, was an act of the Legislature; and inasmuch as the treaty-making power cannot make a treaty of peace in this case, I think the legislative power should be exercised in declaring the restoration of the condition of peace, in declaring when, in the judgment of Congress, we have reached a cessation of the condition of insurrection. Congress has power to put an end to the old condition, or both Houses by receiving members from those States decide in effect that the condition of war has ceased; but, in the mean time, until that does take place, I think the people in such a State should not be exercising the powers of the inhabitants of an independent State of the Union.

I propose to do this thing by the exercise of the same power which created the existing condition of affairs in the act of 1861. I wish by the law to state the condition, and to let Congress decide upon the condition of things which will restore the States to their former relations. That should be done by the two branches of Congress, either by the passage of a law or the admission of members. That seems to me to be untying the knot in the manner in which it was tied.

For these reasons, and because I want the law to be a general law like other laws for all States in the same contingencies, I prefer the amendment which I have presented. The suggestion of the honorable Senator from Illinois, that the President might declare a State to be in a condition of insurrection in order to prevent her voting for President, is to me too distant, too improbable, too extravagant a supposition for anybody to present it as an argument.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont a question, and before doing so I will make a statement. It is my purpose to recognize the State government of Tennessee, Louisiana, and Arkansas, and to vote for the reception of the Senators from those States whenever they present themselves. Suppose we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to-day, and Senators from those three States present themselves to-morrow for reception here, and the members of the other House present themselves to that House, is there anything in this amendment to preclude such action? Will the reception of those Senators and Representatives re-instate those States in the Union as they were before they rebelled?

Mr. COLLAMER. The gentleman has put this question very candidly and he is entitled to as much of an answer as I am prepared to make. The adoption of my amendment would in no way in my estimation embarrass the question which the gentleman puts, or any action which Congress might take upon it. To be sure it would do what it says, shut out the electoral votes which have been cast in any of these States heretofore in the interim; that is all.

I will say, further, that in deciding upon receiving Senators from any State which has been in a condition of insurrection, I do not think it is necessary that there should be a law like that which is ordinarily passed, called an "enabling act," to enable a Territory to form a State government. I do not think it needs any new law of Congress to enable the people of any one of the States which are in insurrection to lay down their arms, go home, and submit to the operations of the General Government, reorganize their State government, and present their Representatives for admission here. I say it requires no previous law of Congress to enable them to do that. Indeed we have decided repeatedly in Congress that it needs no enabling act to enable a Territory to form a State government. If they do meet in convention, and do form a State constitution, republican in its form, and actually elect their members and Senators under it, Congress has recognized such States and received those Senators and members elected before any act was passed on the subject by Congress. No doubt in my mind the same thing may be done here. If we are satisfied that the reorganization is substantial and abiding, that it has been fairly made, and that it will answer the ends of reorganization, undoubtedly we may admit, by our act here, the Senators, and the other House may admit the Representatives, without any previous action of Congress about it. I think the gentleman has my whole answer.

Mr. POWELL. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. If the Senate were to admit the Senators from those States, and the other House should admit their Representatives, then would the electoral votes be counted in elections held hereafter unless Congress should pass a law preventing it?

Mr. COLLAMER. Certainly. And I have put in my amendment the very words that they shall not cast electoral votes until either their condition of rebellion has been declared to cease by virtue of a law of Congress, or their members are admitted to seats in both branches of Congress.

Mr. POWELL. I was not aware that the latter provision was in the amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have made that modification.

Mr. POWELL. Was it proposed to-day?

Mr. COLLAMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. POWELL. I was not aware of it.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am free to acknowledge that I prefer the proposition in this form so that this law, when passed, shall stand consistently with the laws we have heretofore enacted. And I wish it to stand in a shape requiring that the members shall have been admitted in both Houses. I do not want a quarrel and controversy got up by a possible supposition of the two Houses differing on the question.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not yet understand the Senator from Vermont to have answered the question whether he would receive members from States declared to be in insurrection, and admit them here unless there was a previous act of Congress or proclamation of the President removing the restriction. Would he receive Senators while there was non-intercourse between the States they represented and the other States?

Mr. COLLAMER. I thought I had answered that, and I think if I had been listened to attentively it would be found that I had answered.

Mr. POMEROY. I listened attentively.

Mr. COLLAMER. I resembled the case, for it is the nearest parallel I can make, to the case of a Territory which organized a State government and sent representatives here.

Mr. POMEROY. There is no non-intercourse proclaimed with Territories.

Mr. COLLAMER. That makes no difference as to this point. Here we have prevented commercial intercourse because of the existence of a state of war. Though the people of a Territory had no right to elect a Senator when they did elect him in the case I have mentioned, and though they had no right at that time to elect members to Congress, yet if they did make a constitution and did make those elections, and Congress afterward by law ratify what they have done, it is all well enough. Just so here; though these States have not by any previous legislation of Congress been declared to be out of the condition of insurrection, yet if they are so in point of fact, and it turns out that they have regularly reorganized a loyal State government under the United States and made elections accordingly, and Congress on examination become satisfied of that, find that to be true, and that the government they have formed will answer all the purposes of a State government and can be perpetuated, and Congress then admits their representatives, that is the end of it. My amendment is that when their representatives are admitted by the two Houses their electoral votes shall be received.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to know, after we authorize the President by proclamation to cut off all commercial intercourse with the rebellious States, whether the President himself, without any further act of Congress, cannot restore that commercial intercourse; whether, as fast as the rebellion disappears before the advance of our armies, this intercourse is not restored in the same proportion? I think the honorable Senator's view of it involves a non sequitur. Because we have authorized the President to cut off intercourse with these States, it does not follow that it will require another law to restore it. It restores itself, of itself, the moment the rebellion has been put down. It comes back of itself; it is the natural condition which was disturbed and deranged by this abnormal state of affairs which the rebellion introduced; it is not necessary that there should be any further legislation in order to bring it back to the healthful and ordinary condition.

Mr. JOHNSON. When I was up before I had not the act of July, 1861, before me, to which my friend from Vermont has referred. I have it now, and I think it will be found entirely inconsistent with the proposition which his amendment includes. I understand his amendment to be that no votes, either cast now or cast hereafter for electors of President and Vice President, are to be counted until either Congress shall by law declare that the States are to be considered as States in the Union, or until both branches of Congress shall have received the representatives who may have been elected by the inhabitants of such States. The proclamation to which my friend refers is the proclamation which the President was authorized to issue under the authority of the fifth section of the act of July 13, 1861.

A majority of the Supreme Court decided that war existed between the United States and the rebellious States just as efficiently before the act of July 13, 1861, was passed, as afterward. The only difference between the judges was whether it was to be considered as existing until the act of July 13 was passed; but the court decided that it would have been perfectly immaterial whether the act of July 13 had been passed at all; and the majority who held that opinion said that after the act of 13th of July was passed there could be no doubt of the question, because that act recognized a state of war. The minority of the court was of opinion that until the act of July 13 was passed, it was to be considered merely as an insurrection, not affecting at all the political relation existing between the States in rebellion and the rest of the States. The act of July 13, in the section which alone applies to the case, merely says:

"That whenever the President, in pursuance of the provisions of the second section of the act entitled 'An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for that purpose,' approved February 28, 1795, shall have called forth the militia to suppress combinations against the laws of the United States, and to cause the laws to be duly executed, and the insurgents shall have failed to disperse by the time directed by the President, and when said insurgents claim to act under the authority of any State or States, and such claim is not disclaimed or repudiated by the persons exercising the functions of government in said State or States, or in the part or parts thereof in which said combination exists, nor such insurrection suppressed by said State or States, then, and in such case it may and shall be lawful for the President by proclamation to declare that the inhabitants of such State, or any section or part thereof, where such insurrection exists, are in a state of insurrection against the United States; and thereupon all commercial intercourse by and between the same and the citizens thereof and the citizens of the rest of the United States shall cease and be unlawful."

How long? Until Congress shall declare that the condition of hostility no longer exists, or until the President shall declare that it no longer exists? No, but "Shall cease and be unlawful so long as such condition of hostility shall continue."

So that, looking to the mere words of the act, and looking to the constitutional authority of Congress, and consequently the duty of Congress, the moment the insurrection ends, or, to use the language of the act, the moment the hostility ceases, then the commercial intercourse begins again, and that beginning, the State is back in the Union for all purposes. Now, therefore, the only question is, (as that act does not provide that the state of hostilities is to continue until Congress shall, by some act thereafter, declare that such hostilities have terminated,) whether the act itself, with reference to the provisions contained in the fifth section, does not expire upon the happening of the contingency of the cessation of hostilities. How would that be in a certain state of things that can well be imagined?

That act was passed on the 13th of July. The President, sometime in August, issued a proclamation stating that these States were in a state of insurrection. Suppose soon after that, Congress having adjourned and not being in session, every man in each one of these States so declared to be in hostility to the United States had laid down his arms, ceased to carry on any hostile proceeding against the United States, would they not be entitled to the benefit of the Constitution of the United States until Congress should meet in the following month of December and by act of Congress declare hostilities to have terminated, or until the two branches should have received the members?

I submit—of course with due deference, because my friend from Vermont entertains a different opinion—that the moment that in point of fact hostilities have ended, the rebellion is at an end; and the moment the rebellion is at an end the States are back. My friend tells us, and tells us very properly, that in the case of an international war once properly commenced, it cannot be terminated by any treaty which does not receive the sanction of the Senate of the United States. This is all true enough, but the war may terminate long before any treaty is made.

Suppose that during the last war with England she had withdrawn all her armies, had pronounced her determination through her Parliament that as far as she was concerned she wished to be considered at peace with the United States, would not the war in point of fact have terminated, although there was no treaty of peace? The Constitution provides that Congress shall declare war. Suppose they do not declare war, may not war exist in the absence of a declaration? Certainly it may. That the courts have decided over and over again. And if war can commence by the happening of hostilities in point of fact, and be accepted by the President in defending the nation under his authority to see that the constitution and laws are faithfully executed, why cannot the war be terminated in point of fact, even an international war? But in relation to a war of this description, as I stated just now, there can be no doubt on that point. Congress has no constitutional right to carry on a war against States. If my friend will look at the decision in the prize cases he will find that the majority and minority both admitted that there is not in Congress or in any department of the Government any power to declare war as against a State. It is not provided for in the Constitution. The whole authority that Congress have on the subject, is under the power to suppress insurrection. Whether in suppressing insurrection the insurrection may culminate to such a point as to amount to war in the meaning of the prize law, is another question; but so far as the declaration of war is concerned, there is no authority at all in Congress, or in any other department of the Government, legislative or executive, to declare war against a State.

Then what is the authority, the sole authority? To call out the militia and the forces of the United States to put down insurrection. How long does that last? Only so long as that insurrection continues. That must be very clear. How was it with what is called the whisky insurrection? It did not go to the extent that the courts or the President would have been authorized to say that a state of war existed between Pennsylvania and the United States. Congress did not declare that the insurrection was at an end; nothing like it. The President declared it. It ended itself. The insurrectionists laid down their arms, expressed willingness to yield obedience to the authority of the United States, and that ended the insurrection and disbanded our forces, and that happening, the State of Pennsylvania, every part of it, stood exactly in the relation, for all purposes, in which the State and every part of it stood before the insurrection was commenced. There is in the Constitution no power to declare war against the State of Tennessee, (to take a single case,) and nobody, I suppose, will say that there is. The Constitution never contemplated such a contingency. It was proposed in the Convention, but it was objected to upon the ground that a provision of that description would place the United States in their relation to the State against which war was declared as a foreign nation for all purposes, and carry the State out of the Union. The answer was that all that was necessary to have accomplished what could be accomplished by giving to Congress the authority to declare war against a State, was to make each citizen of the United States amenable to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and to empower the Government to put down insurrection.

That being my view, I maintain, I repeat it again, (with great respect for the opposite opinion entertained by the honorable member from Vermont,) that if these men were to throw down their arms to-morrow they would be in the Union, and we have no authority to keep them out. The authority to keep them out now is because of the insurrection, and because of our authority by force of arms to put down that insurrection; but, the insurrection terminating, they stand as they stood before.

Mr. CLARK. I suppose the Senator would not insist that this vote should be counted even if they did throw down their arms.

Mr. JOHNSON. Not at all; by no manner of means.

Now, Mr. President, a singular state of things is existing at the very moment I am speaking. The President of the United States, under the authority of the act of 1861, has declared these States in a state of insurrection, and we have hundreds of thousands of men upon the field of battle. What is said to be the case? Officially or unofficially he sends or authorizes to go to Richmond a very respectable gentleman, as it is supposed to ascertain upon what terms this war can terminate, or, to state it in different words, on what terms or conditions this insurrection can terminate. He goes. He is said to have returned. While there he had an interview with these rebel authorities. He returns. He goes back again in a Government vessel. Did he, after his return and before he went back to Richmond, have an interview with the President of the United States? If so, what was the result of that interview? We do not know, but we may have our speculations about it. Suppose that in that interview, acting under an express authority from the confederate authorities, he informed the President of the United States that they are willing to lay down their arms now, and come back into the Union at once; that they are willing to admit that slavery is either actually abolished by force of his proclamation, or that it has been abolished to the extent that your armies have gone and you have got actual physical possession of the negro; and that they are willing to leave the question of the effect of the proclamation over such portion of the slaves as have not come within the possession of the military authorities of the United States to be passed upon by the courts. The President, it is said, is willing to do that. He has said that more than once.

Suppose, further, that they are willing—I am dealing in speculation; but I believe to a certain extent it is right—suppose they are willing to say, "We assent in coming back to the Union to be governed by any constitutional amendment which may be now in progress, or which may be started hereafter, abolishing slavery throughout the United States;" and the President says, (for no treaty is necessary,) "I agree; I am warring against you now exclusively under the authority of the act of the 13th of July, 1861. I agree to that; if you will throw down your arms and express a willingness to abide by the decision of the courts on all questions of doubt in relation to the continuance of slavery, if you will not claim the right to have restored to slavery those who have enjoyed even for a moment the blessings of freedom, and you are willing to stand by any constitutional amendment upon that subject which may be adopted by the required number of States, come back, come back, for I have no right to carry on the war further; the war ends of itself." It would be, in my view, upon the part of the President murder if he authorized a single man to be shot upon the field of battle or otherwise after such a state of things as that should arise.

Suppose—and no doubt that will be a condition if we are to have peace, and I pray to God we may have it—these gentlemen should say further that there is one condition which must be understood between us. Suppose they should say (and I believe it is true of some of them) they have honestly believed that the right of secession exists. Gentlemen are not to forget that upon that question some of the best minds in the country, North and South, have held different opinions. Many of them have entertained that opinion. I think it is a terrible heresy, as the result has proved, a most pestilent heresy, a destructive heresy, but it was earnestly entertained. The President of the United States himself, when he was in Congress in 1845 or 1846, if he meant what his words stated, entertained it. Some of the leading presses of the country at the North have entertained it. I mention it not for the purpose of giving it any little support that it might possibly derive from any opinion of my own upon it, or weakening it by the expression of an adverse opinion, an opinion which I have sincerely entertained from the time I was capable of thinking; but I cannot be blind to the fact that some of the best men of the South, patriotic men, were of that opinion; and the inhabitants of the South to a great extent, and particularly the young and ardent who thought they were the salt of the earth, because of the existence of the institution of slavery, and that there could be no civilization without it, have been made to believe that the doctrine was a sound one. They have seen their error. God knows they ought to have seen it. They see it now in its recognition in their own constitution. They are threatened now with destruction, with dissolution, because they have incorporated that doctrine in their constitution. They see—and God be praised that they have been made to see it—that the resolution of the country is so perfect, and the devotion to the Union is so absolute, that, happen what will, we of the loyal States mean to prosecute the war to the end until the insurrection is put down, which has no other foundation in point of law than the assumed right of secession.

Now, suppose that these commissioners who are said to be with the President—Stephens, who denounced secession, and predicted almost in words what the South has suffered; Hunter, who never was a party to it; Campbell, of the Supreme Court, who, I know, whatever his opinions may have been when he was at the bar of Alabama, after he came to be a member of the Supreme Court, and it was his duty to study the decisions of that tribunal to make himself fit to discharge its eminent duties, and after he became eminently capable, thought it was the vilest heresy that ever entered into the imagination of man, but was carried away by circumstances surrounding him—suppose they come and say to the President, and say to us, "We know that the whole thing has been wrong; we see the horrors which have resulted from it. To say nothing of the consequences to the North, which are comparatively trifling, we cannot look upon our own fields, our own States, and our own homes, without feeling that we have committed the error of our lives, and sinned against the God of justice, whose judgment it has been to visit us with these horrors. We see it all; we know that we have been led astray by a few master-spirits; but we feel in honor bound to stand by them. We ask, therefore, a general amnesty; pardon all." Suppose the President says, and he has a right to say it under the authority with which he is clothed, the pardoning power—these men being offenders against their duties as citizens, and having committed treason, he has the power to pardon them—suppose he says, "I pardon all." He issues the amnesty proclamation to-morrow, announces that the rebellion is ended, the insurrection terminated, and upon terms honorable to the United States. The plea upon which it rested for its justification constitutionally is withdrawn. They confess it has no foundation. They are back. Can you say that he has not the authority to do so? We have not the authority; it belongs to him; and it is for him to decide when he will exercise it. He turns to the act of 13th July, 1861, and he finds that the termination of his power to use the Navy and Army of the United States and the militia of the United States to put down the insurrection is the termination of the insurrection, and he comes back to the seat of Government and announces to the constituted authorities of Congress and the country that the war is over. What are we to say? It is not necessary to consult us; I mean in point of law. The manner of doing this is quite another thing. I have my own opinion about that. I do not choose to express it here.

But suppose he comes back and issues a proclamation such as I have indicated—and God grant that he may, provided the terms be honorable and fair—and communicates the facts to Congress, what are you going to do? Why, Senators, what happened the other day? It was shown that notwithstanding the arts of the traitor and the demagogue, no length of time will be sufficient to exclude from the bosom of Americans the affection which they hold toward each other and toward their country. These commissioners it was known had left Richmond on their way here upon some mission of peace. They first went through the lines of their troops. How did they go through? Amidst the huzzas and gladdened shouts of the thousands and thousands of men who are there in battle array against the opposite foe. They passed their lines; and we are told by the Richmond press that the moment the news reached the Army of the United States, the soldiers cheered universally until each man grew hoarse. Cheered for what on either side? Cheered because they saw, as they thought, that the war which had made them enemies was about to terminate; that the ancient brotherhood was to be restored; that they should no more meet each other in battle-array, or in the grasp of death, to do all they could to murder each other; but that the time was approaching when they could embrace each other as brethren and as American citizens.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. How does the Senator know but that the southern army, so called, cheered because they believed that those commissioners were going to arrange the terms for their independence, as they term it? And how does the Senator know but that our Army cheered because they believed the commissioners were going to acknowledge the power of the Union and the supremacy of our flag?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know. I think I have already stated that I do not know anything about it. But how does the honorable member know that they did not? If both sides cheered, the probability is that they were cheering for the same purpose. But let me answer the honorable member. The southern soldiers, and particularly the officers, are not so besotted as to believe that this war is to terminate by the recognition of their independence, particularly at this time. The armies of the Union and the navies of the Union are triumphant everywhere. Victory perches upon our standard in every battle-field and upon every naval encounter, and these men know that.

Jefferson Davis, or those in authority, never would have authorized commissioners except under an authority to yield their asserted independence and to recognize the continuing integrity of the Union.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator will permit me—

Mr. JOHNSON. I would rather not be interrupted now.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well; I merely rose to ask the Senator a question for information.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have only a word or two more to say.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the Senator's pardon for having interrupted him.

Mr. JOHNSON. Not at all. I am perfectly willing that either of the gentlemen should rise and put any question to me, and I only objected to the honorable member from Michigan because I was about to close. I will not postpone any question put to me for any length of time.

But suppose we do not know for what they were cheering. Have we any right to suppose that the fact is not as I have stated? Is it so improbable that no sane man could suppose they were cheering for such a thing?

Mr. COLLAMER. Perhaps they were cheering at the idea that they would be able to go home in peace.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no doubt about that. I refer to this, Mr. President, simply for the purpose of showing that no matter what has happened in the past, no matter how bitterly we have felt toward the South, if we have felt bitterly toward the South, and no matter how bitterly they have felt toward us, as certainly they have, all the indications are that they have seen the error of their ways; and if, having come to that conclusion, they throw down their arms, and the President declares by his proclamation of amnesty that they are all pardoned, and announces to the country that the war is at an end, you may pass as many acts of Congress to raise troops to carry on the war as you please, and you will not get a man. The hearts of the people would rebel at carrying on an unnecessary conflict with those who have stood shoulder to shoulder with us in some of the most trying periods of our history, carrying with us the standard of the Union upon every battle-field contributing to our glory, and sharing with us in that glory. They never will consent, and God forbid that they should, to carry on the war a moment after, in point of fact, obedience has been yielded by these men, criminal or mistaken, and the authority of the Union restored everywhere throughout the country, and the flag floating upon every place on which the flag could properly float.

I have been led into this discussion by my desire to meet the authority of the honorable member from Vermont, and nobody yields to it with more pleasure than I do, who seems to contend that this war must go on until the insurrection is declared to be terminated by Congress, or until Senators and Representatives have been received in the Senate and House of Representatives under the act of July 13, 1861, because, by my interpretation of that act, the President has no power to carry on the war an hour after he is satisfied that the hostility which authorized him to employ the Army and Navy has terminated. Once terminated, for all the consequences he is responsible to the country.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President—

Mr. HENDRICKS. Would you rather speak to-morrow?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us take a recess.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not want to come back here to-night.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Well, we will adjourn until to-morrow.

Mr. COLLAMER. If any gentleman wishes to move an adjournment I will give way.

Mr. COWAN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, and Wright—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Foot, Harding, Hicks, McDougal, Richardson, Riddle, and Saulsbury—8.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole upon the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the special order, being "A bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1866."

The pending question was upon the amendment submitted by Mr. Davis, of Maryland, being to add the following to the bill:

Provided, That no money appropriated for the naval service shall be expended otherwise than in accordance with the following provision, so far as it is applicable; that is to say, that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a Board of Admiralty, which shall consist of the vice admiral and one rear admiral, one commodore, one captain, one commander, and one lieutenant commander, over which the Secretary of the Navy or the officer highest in rank present shall preside; and when the subject under consideration shall appertain to the duties of any bureau in the Navy Department, the chief of such bureau shall be a member of the board, and entitled to sit and vote on the consideration of the subject.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the board shall deliberate in common and advise the Secretary on any matters submitted by him relating to naval organization, naval legislation, the construction, equipment, and armament of vessels, navy-yards, and other naval establishments, and the direction, employment, and disposition of the naval forces in time of war. All such opinions shall be recorded.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That no vessel of war shall be built or materially altered, nor any guns of new construction ordered or adopted, nor any engine for any vessel of-war adopted or ordered, nor any permanent structure for naval service executed, until the plans, estimates, proposals, and contracts for the same shall have been submitted to the board, and its opinion and advice thereon communicated in writing to the Secretary; nor shall any patented invention be bought or adopted for the naval service without first the opinion of the board thereon having been taken; and all experiments decided to test inventions and naval plans and structures shall be conducted under the inspection of the board, or members thereof named by the Secretary, and submitted to the board for its opinion thereon.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That all invitations for plans or proposals for any of the works above mentioned shall be prepared by the board, subject to the approval of the Secretary; and all bids or offers or proposals for the same shall be opened in the presence of the board, and the award made by it, subject to the approval of the Secretary.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary may add to the board, from time to time, other officers of the Navy eligible to the position of chief of bureau, not exceeding three, at any time, for consultation on any of the above subjects. The board may take the opinion of eminent practical engineers, mechanics, machinists, and architects, in their respective branches of art or industry, when in their opinion the public service will be promoted by it, and pay them such reasonable compensation as the Secretary may approve.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon this question the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, and Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, addressed the House for nearly two hours each. [Their remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that when the House again resolves itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on this bill, all general debate terminate in one hour.

Pending the motion,

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 234) for the relief of Louis Roberts;

An act (S. No. 225) for the relief of certain friendly Indians of the Sioux nation in Minnesota; and

An act (H. R. No. 644) to extend to certain persons in the employ of the Government the benefits of the Asylum for the Insane in the District of Columbia.

PROPOSITION TO ADJOURN OVER.

Mr. COX. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope that that motion will not be adopted. It is important to get through with our appropriation bills, which are kept back by these lengthy debates.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered. And then, on motion of Mr. ELDRIDGE, the House (at ten minutes before four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

A bill (H. R. No. 644) to extend to certain persons in the employ of the Government the benefits of the Asylum for the Insane in the District of Columbia.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 31st ultimo, information relative to the barracks proposed to be erected in Washington for the accommodation of clerks on detached service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 571) for the relief of Jethro Bonney—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (H. R. No. 624) to provide for the payment of the value of certain lands and improvements of private citizens appropriated by the United States for Indian reservations in the Territory of Washington—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (H. R. No. 713) for the relief of Hull & Cozzens and John Naylor & Company—to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NESMITH presented a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Auburn to Umatilla City in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. POMEROY presented the petition of James G. Clarke, praying compensation for services rendered as acting chargé d'affaires in Belgium from June 11, 1857, to September 3, 1858; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the petition of Joseph O'Neal, praying compensation for damage sustained by reason of the occupancy of his farm by United States troops during and after the battle of Falling Waters, and for his crop taken and used by the troops; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask leave to present a petition which I do not know exactly the nature of, and which I have not read at length, but it is very respectful in its language, and I suppose it is proper to present it. It is a petition from Mr. E. Bloodgood Beebe of the city of New York, in favor of an offensive and defensive alliance with the confederate States of America for the acquisition of Mexico, Canada, and Cuba, and also in favor of a treaty establishing free commercial and social intercourse between the two confederacies with a view to ultimate reunion. The petition has been sent to me. It is very respectful in its language and elegant in its appearance. I do not know the nature of it, but I was requested to present it, and I ask that it lie on the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I submit that it is a very bad practice for Senators to present petitions they do not know the nature of. It may be a very improper petition to come here. I think the Senator ought certainly to look into it, for the rule requires that the Senator presenting a petition shall state briefly what the petition is. I know nothing about this petition; but when a Senator rises in his place and states that he presents a petition that he does not know the nature of, I think the Senate ought not to receive it.

Mr. FOSTER. Especially, if the honorable Senator will allow me, when he says it is a petition for an alliance, offensive and defensive, with the confederate States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I raise the question of its reception, and object to its reception until the Senator shall be able to state what this petition is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois objects to the reception of this petition, and the question will be on its reception.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to say that I did not know the bearing of the petition on the great question which agitates the country. I have read portions of the petition, enough to see what it is about. I did not mean to tell the Senate that I had not read it. I have looked it over.

Mr. WILSON. Who is it from?

Mr. POMEROY. From Mr. E. Bloodgood Beebe, of New York city. At the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois, I will ask leave to withdraw the petition until to-morrow, and in the mean time I will read it over and judge of its propriety.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection that course will be taken.

PAUL S. FORBES.

Mr. GRIMES. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 94) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to advance to Paul S. Forbes $250,000 additional out of the sum to be paid him under his contract for building a steam screw sloop-of-war, to report the same back without amendment, and recommend its passage. I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to offer a resolution this morning which involves a question of instruction to the Secretary, and I hope the Senator will allow me to do that before taking up the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not think this resolution will take a moment, and I would not ask for its present consideration if it had not been lying in my desk for ten days.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am sure the Senator will not object to my resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the consideration of the joint resolution reported by the Senator from Iowa at this time?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to pay to Paul S. Forbes, of the city of New York, the sum of $250,000 in addition to the sums heretofore paid, to apply on his account of the date of May 22, 1863, for building a steam screw sloop-of-war, the same being an advance payment on the contract to aid in the completion of the vessel; but no part of this sum is to be paid without the assent, in writing, of the sureties of Mr. Forbes, and nothing in this resolution is to be so construed as in any manner to affect or vary the contract except as to the time of making the payment.

Mr. HALE. Is there any report accompanying that resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not aware that there is.

Mr. GRIMES. There is not.

Mr. HALE. I should like to know the reason why there is to be a departure from the contract in this case. The Senate refused by a decided vote at the last session to make any change in the contracts for several vessels, and especially in the case of the Puritan and Dictator. There must be some very particular circumstance about this one, I presume.

Mr. GRIMES. It will be remembered that two or three years ago there was a great deal of clamor because of the lack of speed, as it was said, in our naval vessels. Among other persons who believed that there ought to be greater speed attained by the vessels purchased or built by the United States was a gentleman of the name of Dickerson, of the city of New York. Mr. Dickerson is known by reputation to some members of this body. He induced Mr. Paul S. Forbes, or at any rate Mr. Paul S. Forbes entered into a contract with the Government by which he agreed to build the steamer Idaho for the sum of $600,000, Mr. Dickerson being engineer, and putting in his kind of boilers, and his kind of cut-off, and his kind of engines. Mr. Forbes agreed by that contract to build a certain description of vessel, and that she should attain a speed of fifteen knots an hour. Since the time of his entering into that contract the expense of material and labor, and so on, have greatly increased. He has come before Congress and asked Congress to absolve him from his contract, and pay him several hundred thousand dollars more than he agreed to build the vessel for, and to absolve him also from his obligation to attain the speed of fifteen knots an hour.

The Committee on Naval Affairs refused to do this, but they have agreed that, whereas under his contract for $600,000 he can only receive up to this time $300,000, which he has received, there shall be advanced to him, with the assent of his sureties, the sum of $200,000 to enable him to go on and complete the vessel.

The committee are perfectly well advised that if the vessel is completed, even if she should turn out to be a failure, the hull and the engines as old iron will be worth as much as the amount that has already been advanced and the amount proposed by this resolution to be advanced; and if she attains the speed that Mr. Forbes and Mr. Dickerson imagine she may still attain, though they wish to be absolved from their obligation to give her that amount of speed, she will be worth a large amount more of money.

The sole purpose of the resolution is to save Mr. Forbes from the necessity of being compelled to sacrifice a large amount of his own individual money in order to make an advance to go on to complete the ship; and under no possible circumstance, as the Committee on Naval Affairs are satisfied, and as the Department is satisfied, can anybody be injured. It is a mere advance of a portion of the expense of building, which according to the terms of the contract cannot be paid until the vessel is delivered to the Government and attains the speed of fifteen knots an hour.

I think there is no analogy between this case and the cases that were under consideration at the last session of Congress. It stipulates that this money shall not be received except with the assent in writing of the sureties of Mr. Forbes, and that in no particular shall the receipt of this money or the passage of this resolution be considered as interfering with that contract except so far as relates to this advance payment.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I offer the following resolution of instruction to the Secretary, which ought to be acted upon at once:

Resolved, That the article of amendment proposed by Congress to be added to the Constitution of the United States respecting the extinction of slavery therein, having been inadvertently presented to the President for his approval, it is hereby declared that such approval was unnecessary to give effect to the action of Congress in proposing said amendment, inconsistent with the former practice in reference to all amendments to the Constitution heretofore adopted, and being inadvertently done, should not constitute a precedent for the future; and the Secretary is hereby instructed not to communicate the notice of the approval of said proposed amendment by the President to the House of Representatives.

If the Senate will allow me to make a statement of the practice, if there shall then be any objection to the consideration of the resolution, it may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the consideration of this resolution at the present time?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it had better go over until to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Had not the Senator better let a statement from the record be made as to the practice, and then it may go over if he desires.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that being done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DIXON. I think it had better go over to another day.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does the Senator from Connecticut object to my statement being made?

Mr. DIXON. The resolution must be received to allow the statement to be made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have already stated that I will consent that it shall go over after the statement is made.

Mr. DIXON. If that can be done without the resolution being received, I have no objection; otherwise I have objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DIXON. I think the resolution will give rise to debate, and it had better go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, it must necessarily go over under the rules.

THREE-FOURTHS' VOTE OF RATIFICATION.

Mr. SUMNER. I send to the Chair resolutions which I ask to have read and printed. I shall call them up at a future day.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Concurrent resolutions declaring the rule in ascertaining the three-fourths of the several States required in the ratification of a constitutional amendment:

Whereas Congress, by a vote of two-thirds of both Houses, has proposed an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting slavery throughout the United States, which, according to the existing requirement of the Constitution, will be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the Constitution when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States; and whereas in the present condition of the country, with certain States in arms against the national Government, it becomes necessary to determine what number of States constitutes the three-fourths required by the Constitution: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the rule followed in ascertaining the two-thirds of both Houses proposing the amendment to the Constitution should be followed in ascertaining the three-fourths of the several States ratifying the amendment; that, as in the first case, the two-thirds are founded on the simple fact of representation in the two Houses, so in the second case the three-fourths must be founded on the simple fact of representation in the Government of the country and the support thereof; and that any other rule establishes one basis for the proposition of the amendment and another for its ratification, placing one on a simple fact and the other on a claim of right, while it also recognizes the power of rebels in arms to interpose a veto upon the national Government in one of its highest functions.

Resolved, That all acts, executive and legislative, in pursuance of the Constitution, and all treaties made under the authority of the United States, are valid to all intents and purposes throughout the United States, although certain rebel States fail to participate therein, and that the same rule is equally applicable to an amendment of the Constitution.

Resolved, That the amendment of the Constitution, prohibiting slavery throughout the United States will be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution, whenever ratified by three-fourths of the States, de facto, exercising the powers and prerogatives of the United States under the Constitution thereof.

Resolved, That any other rule requiring the participation of the rebel States, while illogical and unreasonable, is dangerous in its consequences, inasmuch as all recent presidential proclamations, including that of emancipation, also all the recent acts of Congress, including those creating the national debt and establishing a national currency, and also all recent treaties, including the treaty with Great Britain for the extinction of the slave trade, have been made, enacted, or ratified, respectively, without any participation of the rebel States.

Resolved, That any other rule must tend to postpone the great day when the prohibition of slavery will be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution of the United States; but the rule herewith declared will assure the immediate ratification of the prohibition, and the consummation of the national desires.

The resolutions were ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask that they now lie on the table. I propose to call them up and make a motion in regard to them at a future day.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. They ought to go to the committee.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask that they now lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to lay on the table takes precedence of that to commit.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire, during the morning hour, to pass a bill of general importance, to which I think there will be no objection when it is read. It is Senate bill No. 403, to amend the act for the encouragement of immigration. I move to postpone all prior orders, with a view to take up that bill.

Mr. WILSON. I hope it will not be done.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us go through with the morning business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HALE. Are not reports in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Reports will be in order if the motion shall not prevail.

Mr. HALE. The Chair has sometimes decided that they were in order, notwithstanding such a motion was made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Never. The Senator is mistaken. A motion to postpone all prior orders is a motion which has never been known to be out of order in this body within the knowledge of the Chair. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was not agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa in favor of the construction of a military and wagon road from some point on the west side of the Missouri river at or near the mouth of the Niobrara river in Nebraska Territory, to Gallatin, in Idaho Territory, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of James J. Johnson, praying compensation for services rendered as veterinary surgeon of the fourth Iowa cavalry, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred papers relating to the claim of W. H. and C. S. Duncan, for supplies furnished to a company of Kansas militia, mustered into service in 1856, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James F. Simmons, praying compensation for the illegal seizure of a vessel and cargo by Commander Wooden, of the Stars and Stripes, and the subsequent wreck and loss of the same on Long Island, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the petitioner being dead; which was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. The Committee on Territories, to which was referred a petition of natives of Louisiana, citizens of the United States of African descent, praying that all the citizens of Louisiana of African descent born free before the rebellion may be admitted to the rights and privileges of electors; and also a petition of colored citizens of the United States, praying that the elective franchise be granted to the colored people of the United States; and also a petition of citizens of African descent, praying that the right of suffrage may be granted to all the natives of Louisiana of African descent; and also a memorial of the National Clubs of the city of New York and vicinity, praying that freed slaves may be permitted to take part in the reconstruction of the rebellious States, and that the right of suffrage be not confined exclusively to white persons, have had them under consideration, and have instructed me to ask that the committee be discharged from their further consideration. In explanation of this motion I am instructed by the committee to say that these memorials were all with one exception referred, as we think very appropriately, to the select committee on slavery and freedmen; but as that committee had them under consideration, and asked to be discharged on the ground that they did not come within their jurisdiction, the Committee on Territories are at a loss to know what committee they do come under, and I therefore move that the Committee on Territories be discharged from the further consideration of these memorials, and that they lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. The Committee on Territories, to whom were referred sundry petitions of loyal citizens of the State of Virginia, praying that Congress may give Virginia a territorial government, and also some remonstrances against the prayer of these petitions, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to move that the committee be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print the memorial of S. D. Carpenter, praying an examination of his invention of a new method of defensive armor in the construction of war vessels, with a view to its adoption by the Government, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution to print extra copies of the Correspondence on Mexican Affairs, reported it with an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to, and the resolution as amended adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That five hundred additional copies of the Correspondence on Mexican Affairs be printed for the use of the Senate, and that two hundred copies be printed for the use of the Department of State.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, the following resolution, submitted by him on the 2d instant, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be instructed to inquire as to the policy of organizing a territorial government for the country lying between Kansas and Texas, known as the Indian country, and to report by bill or otherwise.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 427) for the protection of passengers; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 428) to prevent the sale of notes, scrip, bonds, or other evidence of debt issued by rebel authorities; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 107) providing for the further decoration of the Capitol; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COLLAMER. I should like to know the purport of that resolution. What sort of decoration does it provide for?

Mr. FOOT. Let the resolution be read at length.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to say, in justice to myself, that I have not drawn up this joint resolution with malice prepense. It is a joint resolution which has been introduced into the House of Representatives by a distinguished member of that House, and at his instance I have offered it here.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is a resolution for a painting, is it not?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes.

Mr. FOOT. Let it be read, so that we can understand it.

The Secretary read the resolution. It proposes to direct the Joint Committee on the Library to enter into a contract with William H. Powell to paint a picture for the United States, to be placed at the head of one of the grand staircases in the Capitol, illustrative of some naval victory, at a price not to exceed $25,000.

Mr. COLLAMER. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 91) in relation to the treaty of 1817.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 641) to provide for another term of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Arkansas, and for other purposes.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD.

On motion of Mr. DIXON the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 411) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia," the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia to add to the second section the following proviso:

Provided, That the directors of said Metropolitan Railroad Company shall have power to require the subscribers to the capital stock to pay the amount by them respectively subscribed at such time, in such manner, and in such installments as they may deem proper; and if any stockholders shall refuse or neglect to pay any installments, as required by a resolution of the board of directors, after reasonable notice of the same, the said board of directors may forfeit said stock and all previous payments thereon for the use of said corporation, under such general regulations as may be adopted in the by-laws of said corporation, or may sue for and collect the same in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. DIXON. I propose to amend the amendment by striking out the words "forfeit said stock and all previous payments thereon to the use of said corporation," and inserting these words in lieu of them:

Sell at public auction to the highest bidder so many shares of said stock as shall pay said installments; and the highest bidder shall be taken to be the person who offers to purchase the least number of shares for the assessment due.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment as amended was adopted.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer this amendment as a new section to come in at the end of the bill:

And be it further enacted, That the provision prohibiting any exclusion from any car on account of color, already applicable to the Metropolitan railroad, is hereby extended to every other railroad in the District of Columbia.

The object of that simply is to equalize the railroads.

Mr. DIXON. I suggest to the Senator that he had better offer it on some other bill. To incur this charter with provisions that apply to other roads, it seems to me, is improper. The thing itself, as it respects this railroad, is provided for in the charter of this company.

Mr. SUMNER. The object of the proposition that I have made is to equalize the condition of the railroads in this city. The Metropolitan railroad, with regard to which we are now legislating, already is put under this condition, and the friends of that railroad very justly complain that it is not fair that the other railroads should not be under the same provision. The object of my amendment is to subject all the other railroads that are in business competition, of course, with the Metropolitan railroad to the same condition which Congress has imposed upon that road. The proposition, therefore, is just with regard to the different roads between themselves, besides its great intrinsic justice.

Mr. HALE. I entirely agree with the principle of the amendment; but it strikes me that it is anomalous legislation in a private act, which is a charter of a private company, which will be printed and published with the private laws, to incorporate a provision of public law. I think it is incongruous and out of place in this bill, with great deference to my friend. I will vote with him to put it in any public law to which he will move it, but I think it is not fair to put it on a private bill. It is putting a public law applicable to all companies into the private charter of one company.

Mr. CONNESS. I would suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that a bill introduced by his colleague this morning provides for it; it covers that point exactly.

Mr. SUMNER. How so?

Mr. CONNESS. It is a bill to compel all carriers of passengers in the United States to give access to all persons on any ship, or railroad, or steamboat, as the case may be, or at the table or elsewhere.

Mr. DAVIS. And state-rooms?

Mr. CONNESS. I suppose in state-rooms too, to establish the rule of "first come first served." It is a bill of wider application than the amendment proposed by the Senator now, and I too am opposed to his loading this bill with his proposition. The bill offered this morning by the Senator's colleague, [Mr. WILSON,] the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, is decidedly the widest in its scope on this subject, the most humanitarian and general, that has ever yet been proposed; and the honorable Senator now offering this amendment can make no improvement upon it.

Mr. SUMNER. I have a rule a little different, I see, from that of my honorable friend from California. I am in favor of getting what I can as soon as I can, and not postponing it to an indefinite future. My honorable friend reminds me that my colleague has introduced a bill of a much larger scope; can he give the country any assurance that the bill of my colleague will become a law of the land?

Mr. CONNESS. I cannot.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; then I presume my friend is not in earnest in his position. Now I come to my other friend, the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] who objects to this proposition on the ground, if I understood him, that it is introducing a general provision into what he chooses to call a private bill. How is it a private bill? I do not understand it so. It is a bill chartering a railroad company in the District of Columbia; and Congress does that in the exercise of those special powers that are given to it by the Constitution; and the provision becomes important, as I have already said, in two respects: first, for the sake of the Metropolitan Railroad Company itself, which has been brought into disfavor in comparison with other railroads, because Congress have put the condition requiring that there shall be no exclusion of color in its charter; I say, therefore, the proposition is favorable to that road. And in the second place it is entirely germane to the question. In legislating on a railroad, what is more germane than that the Senate should ingraft upon the charter any proposition, special or general, which should concern the subject matter? I say, therefore, that the suggestions of both my honorable friends fall to the ground; they cannot prevail if Senators are in earnest on this subject.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I say nothing in reference to this proposed amendment, but I wish to record my name against all such legislation. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for them too.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Farwell, Foot, Harlin, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Hale, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wright—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cardie, Chandler, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Hicks, McDougal, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Wade, and Wilkinson—12.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. SUMNER. I now renew my amendment in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. WILSON. I move to postpone the further consideration of that measure in order to finish this.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Being objected to, the morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose it is in order to move to postpone that and take up another bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. WILSON. Then I move to postpone the pending and all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill which the Senate had before it in the morning hour yesterday—Senate bill No. 408, in addition to the several acts for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes. I wish to state that that bill was up yesterday, and was postponed until this morning. I supposed yesterday that we should finish the matter we were then debating; but afterward I came to the conclusion that there was no disposition to finish it, and I do not believe there is any to-day. This bill to amend the enrollment acts ought to be acted on at once.

Mr. COLLAMER. These votes will have to be counted on Wednesday next.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senator will allow us to dispose of that matter and not interpose his bill.

Mr. WILSON. I must say that I have been crowded out for four days by this mere gabble and talk on this subject. I withdraw my motion, but unless the Senator from Illinois gets through with this measure in two hours, I shall renew it, and have a fight over it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn, and the unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate.

REPRESENTATION IN ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] and upon that question the Senator from Vermont is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Before the Senator from Vermont proceeds, I desire to ask for the yeas and nays upon his amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, I think any man must be exceedingly dull who would not have understood from the hints and remarks made this morning in relation to this topic that the Senate are very impatient for a vote. I do not blame them for being impatient. But, rising as I do to reply to the speech of the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] delivered yesterday, I will not promise that I shall be able to gratify them with even my usual brevity. I will endeavor to be as brief as I can in justice to the subject.

In the first place, Mr. President, there perhaps is due from me to that honorable Senator some little notice that I am not entirely insensible to what he has on this and other occasions permitted himself to indulge in in his remarks with respect to my professional ability and discernment. I have never made any reply to them, but at the same time I wish it to be understood that I am not entirely ungrateful or insensible to such remarks. I will merely say that the opportunities I have had to inform myself in relation to the honorable Senator's high acquirements in his profession, his legal acumen, and the perspicuity of his logic have given me a very high appreciation thereof. If I were to say merely that I reciprocate the sentiments he has expressed, and entertain a sincere respect for his professional superiority as high as he entertains of mine, he might consider it at least but a questionable compliment; but I will add to it that I have as high an estimation, and even higher, of him than he has thought proper to express in relation to me. I think that ought to be satisfactory.

But, sir, after all, I could not but observe that the honorable Senator, when speaking in that manner, very courteously and very kindly, always accompanied it with an argument of great weight, coming from him, to show that the positions I took were wholly untenable. How much, therefore, the respect that is paid to my opinions is worth when accompanied by such sort of argument, he and other gentlemen can answer for themselves.

Mr. President, the amendment which I have proposed has in it one very important feature, to which the gentleman has addressed himself; and that is, that the States which have been declared in a state of insurrection are incapable of exercising their privileges or their duties within this Government as integral parts of this Union while they continue in that situation, and that their restoration shall be either by an act of Congress or by the reception of their representatives by the two Houses. That involves this point: whether Congress have anything to do in the matter in relation to the reorganization and reestablishment of these States. The Senator seems to think not; and he goes on to make some remarks which I will not attempt to repeat, but the substance of them is that they are States in the Union—I agree to that—and, being in the Union, if the hostilities cease there is an end of all action about it; they are remitted to all their rights, and may exercise all their functions as integral parts of this Government without the consent of this Government one way or the other. There I dissent.

The gentleman says that a war may exist without any declaration of war. I agree to that. He says that if Great Britain should wage a war upon us, and were in the exercise of that war, it would be a war though we had not declared it, nor they either. I grant it. He then says that if they should upon the whole surcease that war, withdraw their military force, and Parliament should declare that they were no longer in a state of hostility with the United States, that that would be an end of that war. There is exactly the point where we differ. That is exactly the point where we separate. I know that one party between two or more nations may make a war, but I say that both parties are required to make peace. If Great Britain were to actually levy war upon this country, besiege our cities, lay waste our coasts, capture our vessels, and then, when we had undertaken to defend ourselves with some success, they should withdraw from it, and declare to the world that there is peace between us, that would not be peace, nor would that war be ended. I insist that both parties must agree to the peace, and that the surcease of hostilities by one side does not end the war. Every nation undoubtedly has the right in a state of war, when negotiating for peace, to insist upon indemnity for the past and security for the future. If one party can make a war and make a peace when they please, without the consent of the other party, then neither of these rights of insisting upon indemnity for the past or security for the future can any longer exist. I say that if Great Britain had made such a war upon us, we would not be obliged to surcease our hostilities in defense of ourselves and the capture of their vessels because they ceased, until we had made a treaty which gives us indemnity for their having made that unjustifiable war upon us. There is the exact point where we separate; and it is in the application of that same point to this war and its analogies that we differ again.

But the Senator says you cannot make war upon a State; they are now States in the Union, and if they surcease hostilities you cannot prosecute the war. I am not insisting that if these people lay down their arms and return peaceably to their habitations, the President can carry the war into their houses. That is not what I am talking about. I am talking about when and how the political status of these States is to be restored, and with whose consent it is to be restored. Is it true that the right to make war in this country consists in the right of the States to make war upon the General Government, but the United States cannot make war upon them? Is it their peculiar privilege and exclusive right to make war upon the General Government? Cannot we do anything about it? Cannot we prosecute war against them? Is it their privilege to make war on the United States as long as they have a mind to do so, and when they become satisfied they are not getting along very well, they have nothing to do but to stop and begin it again when they please, renew it when they have a mind to do so, and it is all an ex parte proceeding, and the Government of the United States has nothing to do with it? I cannot agree to any doctrine of that kind.

But I desire to make a few remarks on this subject of making war upon a State. I have heard a great deal about that first and last. I do not know but I was to blame, when I first heard that doctrine brought forward by Mr. Jefferson Davis in the Senate, for not correcting him. He quoted from the remarks of Mr. Sherman, Mr. Madison, and several other members of the Convention that formed the Constitution who stated that. They did state it; and Mr. Davis used to quote from them. I understood how that was then. It is true I did not at that time explain it. I did not suppose that other people would be misled by it; nor did I suppose that my explanation would ever reach the community, and perhaps never reach the Senate. The remarks I am now making not only will never be read and understood by the community, but will never be read and understood by half the Senate. But still I feel it my duty at this time, as that doctrine is repeated and those quotations are again alluded to, to make some explanation on that point.

Mr. President, you will observe, and any gentleman who chooses to examine into it will find, that Mr. Buchanan put into his last message that same doctrine, and alluded to the very quotations made by Mr. Davis. If you will read that message it will be perfectly apparent that that portion of it which says you cannot make war upon the States was interpolated into the message after it was drawn up. I do not mean clandestinely; I mean interpolated by the President. It is obvious from its connection that it is so. I know that while that message must have been in a period of preparation Mr. Davis returned from his excursion to Maine, where he had spent that summer; and that was the very ground and those were the very quotations which Mr. Davis had used in the Senate; and after his return here, as I think, it was put into that message at his suggestion.

Now, sir, it will be recollected that the Articles of Confederation were never adopted by the people. They never were a constitution; they were a league; and it was declared in them that the States should retain and continue their sovereignty; that it was a league for the mutual defense of the States against foreign Powers. The States were represented in the Congress under the Confederation by their Legislatures appointing the delegates, and withdrawing them when they pleased; and that body had no power of making laws except on the single subject relating to piracy on the high seas. They merely made requisitions on the States that they wanted so much money and so many men; and the States agreed to furnish them, or did not furnish them, as they saw fit. It will be observed that each State had but one vote in the Congress of the Confederation; each had the same weight. When they came to get together in a Convention to form a new Constitution, the small States were very desirous of preserving the Articles of Confederation; of having a mere league; a mere treaty. They were unwilling to give up the weight which they had under the Articles of Confederation; and they therefore proposed that they should be amended so as to oblige the States to furnish their quotas. The question whether they should mend up the old Articles of Confederation, or form a Government with all the functions of Government, executive, legislative, and judicial, was the first great question before that Convention. Even the State of New York, then counted a small State, was very persistent in favor of having the Articles of Confederation amended merely; and when it was finally resolved to abandon that project and form a Government, two out of three of those delegates from New York, Mr. Lansing and Mr. Yates, went home and never returned again.

It was when the Convention were debating that question that these remarks by Mr. Sherman, Mr. Madison, and others, which have been so often quoted, were made about making war upon the States. They said, "You cannot coerce these States to furnish their quota. Why? Because it is war; you can only do it by force. These Articles of Confederation are a treaty, a league, between these States. It is the settled law of nations that a war between the members of one treaty always puts an end to all the treaty stipulations existing; and, therefore, if you make war upon one of these States under the Articles of Confederation to coerce them, that moment you end your Confederation, because it is war, and the war ends it." It is perfectly palpable and plain to me that with articles merely of association in the nature of a treaty between the States, that was strictly and literally true; it could not be done. All the remarks then made by those gentlemen, which are now quoted, were made as applicable to the condition of a league; and yet they are now quoted upon us as being applicable to the condition of a nation as it is now formed, of a national Government.

If we follow out the doctrines of these southern gentlemen who have seceded, they are not inconsistent, because they hold that we are nothing but a league now, and therefore the making of a war would end that league. They therefore are not inconsistent in it; but no man who views this as a Government, with all the functions of government attached to it, and not a league, can quote with propriety those expressions as applicable to our condition. So much for that.

Now, Mr. President, there commenced an insurrection in this country. It never arose, perhaps, to the dignity of a war until the act of 1861 was passed. I know a majority of the Supreme Court decided that in relation to laying a blockade and the making of prizes, &c., that a war existed before that act of 1861 was passed; but all agree that after the act of 1861 was passed it took the character of war. What shape was it that it took? It was this: Congress declared that where there was an insurrection existing in a State claiming to act under the authority of the State, and the authorities of the State did not disclaim it and did not suppress it, in that case the President might declare the inhabitants of that State in a state of insurrection, and all intercourse between the inhabitants of that State and the inhabitants of the rest of the United States should cease. Observe, sir, they did not declare that the war was to be against men who were insurgents. It included all the people of a State whose authorities sustained the insurgency, whether they were loyal or disloyal people. That is the condition of things in a state of war in every country. It may be the misfortune of the minority; but that is their unavoidable condition in time of war. This was declared to be a war with the whole inhabitants of that State. Then it was that it took, in relation to our inhabitants, its true character and condition of a war, and a war between those States, made by them through their functionaries and the body of their people, against the General Government.

Such being the state of war, the question presents itself, When and how is that war to cease, and when and how is the formal political status of the States which are engaged in it, or the inhabitants of those States, to be restored, and who is to declare it? The gentleman from Maryland has argued at much length to show that under the act of 1864, if the hostilities on the part of the enemy stop, the President is compelled to stop hostilities on his part. I do not wish to make controversy about that. What if he does? I know that the President can withdraw all our forces from the southern States to-morrow, if he pleases; he can withdraw all our ships from off the coast and order them to the harbor of New York or Boston. I know that military operations may cease altogether by his act. I know he may pardon all crimes committed against the United States, including treason. That is his power. But, sir, does that alter the condition of the political status of those States in their relationships to this General Government? Suppose the hostilities entirely cease; suppose the rebels throw down their arms and go home to their several habitations; there are in those States the functionaries of their government, their governors, their legislatures, all organized in this revolutionary operation and carrying it on; and is it true that they then have the right to send members to the Senate and House of Representatives, and if they have a right to send them, to demand their admission here, and we have nothing to say about it? Is it true that they may make war upon the General Government, carry it along as far as they please, then stop it, and we are obliged to receive them, until they have had time to revive their powers or resolution and start again, and we cannot help ourselves?

Sir, are there not two sides and two parties to this war? It is the strangest war men ever heard of if it has but one side to it. I take it there are two parties to this war: the several States who have made it, on the one side, and the national Government against whom they have made it, on the other; and I suppose the two parties must participate in the restoration of peace and quietness, and their restoration to their former condition, or a condition where they can perform their functions within the Government as integral parts of the Union. It is for Congress to say when that state of things exists. Congress is not bound to receive their members, or to treat them as being regular, loyal, integral members of this Union because they have succeeded fighting and succeeded military operations, until we have seen a return to loyalty and an obedience to their allegiance and the performance of their fealty, a true restoration of themselves to their former condition of loyalty and obedience; and that must be for Congress to decide. That is the main and essential sentiment of the amendment I have presented.

Sir, when will, and when ought, Congress to admit these States as being in their normal condition? When they see that they furnish evidence of it. It is not enough that they stop their hostility and are repentant. They should present fruits meet for repentance. They should furnish to us by their actions some evidence that the condition of loyalty and obedience is their true condition again, and Congress must pass upon it; otherwise we have no securities. It is not enough that they lay down their arms. Our courts should be established, our taxes should be gathered, our duties should be collected in those States; and before they come here to perform their duties or privileges again as members of this Union, they should place themselves in an attitude showing to us that they have truly taken that position, and we should pass upon it; and I insist that the President, making peace with them, if you please, by succeeding military operations, does not alter their status until Congress passes upon it.

The great and essential thing now to insist upon, in my judgment, is that Congress shall do nothing which can in any way create a doubt about our power over the subject. Indeed it is right to assert at the proper time that we have that power; and how, and when, and in what manner we shall execute that power, is in the discretion of Congress. I do not mean to occupy very much time with that; but one thing I have to say: I believe that when reestablishing the condition of peace with that people, Congress, representing the United States, has power in ending this war as any other war, to get some security for the future. It would be a strange thing if it were not true that this nation, in ending a civil as well as a foreign war, could close it and make peace by securing, if not indemnity for the past, at least some security for future peace. I do not believe that Congress is stripped of that power in relation to this or any other war; and here I do not wish to be understood as undertaking to assert the existence of such a power without some warrant in the Constitution.

The Constitution has in it what is well known as the guarantee section, by which this Government guarantees to every State in the Union a republican form of government. Now, what is implied in that? Several things which are quite obvious. In the first place, that guarantee can only be kept and redeemed by preserving the States within the Union. We cannot carry out a guarantee to States on any other ground than by having and keeping them within the Union. That is necessarily implied.

In the next place that guarantee is to the States as States. It is a guarantee to the State of North Carolina, for instance, that North Carolina, as a State, shall have a republican form of government within this Union; not to be taken and split up and made into different States, but it is a guarantee to that State as a whole State.

Another thing is implied. That is a guarantee to the minority in a State. No man who will read Mr. Madison's remarks upon the subject can be mistaken in that. The very nature of the thing implies that. The majority in a State can shape their form of government as they please without any help from Congress; but the provision was inserted from a fear that the minority might be overborne, especially, said Mr. Madison, in a slaveholding State. The guarantee was therefore inserted for the security of the minority in a State, though there may be but one man there to redeem Sodom.

Again, it is a guarantee from which the States can never discharge the United States. You may say that when they make war on us they discharge us from our obligation in the matter; but that is impossible. That guarantee is not merely for the people of that State; it is a guarantee made for the security of all the States of the Union. I have a right as a representative from the State of Vermont to say that the State of Vermont insists that you shall keep North Carolina in the Union; we formed it with her in it; we had that guarantee, that she should be kept in with a republican form of government, and we have a right to insist on the redemption of that guarantee. Therefore I say no one State can discharge the United States from it.

Such being not only the clearly-expressed guarantee but the plighted national public faith which we are bound to keep, let me put a case. Suppose in all candor that Congress had by experience become convinced that they could not sustain a State within the Union with a republican form of government, holding slaves; suppose we had tried it over and over, and we had beaten them and made peace with them, allowing them to keep their slaves, and they had repeated their rebellion over and over until every man became convinced that it was utterly impracticable and impossible to have a republican form of government under such an aristocracy as that engendered and sustained; and suppose Congress in all candor and seriousness became convinced that we could not keep this guarantee in relation to those States that hold slaves, and they, being at war with us, choose to lay down their arms or we beat them, disperse their forces, and a question arises about fixing the status of those States again, their political condition in relation to this Government, that is, making peace; I say that Congress has a right, if so convinced in all candor, to say that in order to preserve our plighted public faith contained in that guarantee we will destroy and abolish that institution; for we cannot keep our guarantee without doing it. Cannot Congress under the general provision of the Constitution make all laws proper and necessary to carry into effect the powers granted in the Constitution? Clearly. If that is so, then Congress may, in fixing the status of these States, if they are convinced of the proposition I have just stated, make it one of the conditions of their again exercising their franchise as integral members of this Union, that they shall be placed in a position which will enable the Union to continue and exist.

Such being my view, it remains for me to say a few words about what the Senator said yesterday in regard to the present probability of peace. I know nothing about that. I have no admissions to the White House, and no knowledge of proceedings there; but I guess, after all, I have about as much as some members of the Cabinet, [laughter,] and you know a Yankee is allowed to "guess." I have but little expectation of any present cessation of hostilities, even. I have before remarked that I do not think the mere cessation of military operations is necessarily a peace, nor do I think the political status of these States is thereby reestablished. I think it requires two parties to make a peace. I know not what the President may do. I grant that the President may, if he sees fit, pardon all treason. He has that power. Whether he can really dispense with the operations of what is called the confiscation act, I do not know. I had but very little to do with that act, but I believe it provides for making confiscations by proceeding in rem, and trying a man without notice to him. I do not understand much about such proceedings, nor exactly know how far they may go. But it seems to me that, before the President can reestablish these States in the Union, performing the functions of loyal States within this Government and integral parts of it, somehow or other the action of Congress will be needed. That is the very point we have now in discussion, the very point I am after.

I think it does need the action of Congress. How will he get rid of that confiscation law by any action of his own? I surely do not know. Then a law has been passed with his approval declaring that persons who have been engaged in this rebellion are ineligible to appointments to office in this Government. I do not know but that perhaps he may get them in without having that law repealed by Congress, but I cannot tell how. So in whatever aspect you look at the case it is evident that no reestablishment of the former condition of things can take place without the action of Congress. There are many other acts of similar character which stand directly in the way of doing what the Senator from Maryland thinks can be done by the President. Put an end to the hostilities, and there, he says, is the end; the States are in, and we have nothing to do with it; and he cannot support a resolution which declares that we have to do with it! I say we have to do with it; we are the other party in the war, and I think we must participate in the reestablishment of peaceful relations.

The power existing in Congress in the reestablishment of peaceful relations to annex such conditions as are necessary to our preservation and life, another question arises, when and how and in what manner you will exercise the power. Will you ever exercise it at all? Will you ever annex any such conditions? We are told by the papers, which seem to be very hungry for peace, and to be crying "Peace, peace, when there is no peace," that there is no need of saying anything more about the condition to which I have adverted, because the Senate and House of Representatives have passed a constitutional amendment, and that will accomplish the purpose. If I were entirely convinced that we could not sustain a republican government in these States and keep them within this Union in any other way than by having the institution of slavery abolished, and I was inquired of whether I would insist upon that as a prerequisite and condition precedent to their reestablishment, I would say this: if I was perfectly convinced, fully satisfied in my own mind, that the constitutional amendment referred to would be adopted by the constitutional number of States, that would remove the occasion for the exercise of any such power on the part of Congress, but I do not know how that will be. That is a matter which lies in the future. Neither I nor any other man can tell when and how and in what manner it will take place, or whether it will ever take place at all. While things remain suspended in this condition I reserve to myself the right of exercising this power which I think in the extreme Congress constitutionally possesses. In what manner I shall exercise it will depend upon the occasion as it shall present itself. It will depend upon their desire to restore their former condition, how far they have returned to loyalty and allegiance, how far they have so shaped their institutions as to furnish security for the future that the peace would be kept. All these matters would have to be examined into in each case as it presented itself.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "that," where it first occurs, and inserting:

The States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee, are not entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President and Vice President for the term of office commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865; and no electoral votes shall be received or counted from said States concerning the choice of President and Vice President for the said term of office.

The simple effect of my amendment to the amendment is to strike out the preamble and to leave the resolution just as the Committee on the Judiciary reported it. It seems to me that three fourths of the debate that has taken place upon the subject has originated out of the preamble. I think that there is a clear, indicated majority of the Senate in favor of the resolution, and that the Senate are ready to vote simply on the resolution. I do not intend to prolong the debate. I merely rise to announce what will be the effect of the amendment. As I believe that the preamble has given rise to the great body of the debate that has already occurred, I propose to cut off further discussion on the preamble by moving to strike it out, and bring the Senate to act directly and simply upon the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Kentucky whether his amendment is a substitute for the original resolution and preamble.

Mr. DAVIS. My amendment is an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will not persist in his motion. We had a distinct vote yesterday on striking out the preamble. He and I desire to accomplish the same object. I think the debate is pretty much over, and if we can get to a vote we shall soon settle this matter, and it seems to me we had better adhere to the resolution as the Committee on the Judiciary have reported it back. There seems to be a disposition in the Senate to pass a resolution of some character, and we shall soonest accomplish our object by just voting for the proposition as it is. Perhaps it is not in the very best form. As an original proposition I cared nothing about the preamble, nor do I now, but still I think we shall the soonest get through by not offering amendments. I believe the Senate is about ready to vote; and the object to be accomplished seems to be acquiesced in, and that is, to prevent the counting of the votes of certain States.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senate will come to a vote without any further debate I will not press the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us try.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir, I withdraw it, in the hope that we may come to a vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the honorable Senator from Kentucky will not withdraw it, but will accept a modification by inserting after "1865" the words "for the reason that there has been no valid election or appointment of electors of President and Vice President in any of those States."

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Delaware will allow me to suggest that that is the very preamble now. Those very words that he proposes to put in are in the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If that is so, very well. I was not aware of it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will have the preamble read as it was concurred in in Committee of the Whole, I think it will satisfy him.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not about to continue the debate, but only to refer to a sentence or two in two of the books I have on my table. My friend from Vermont seems to suppose that what was said in the Convention that framed the Constitution in relation to the use of force against States had reference alone to the States as they existed under the Articles of Confederation. He will find that Mr. Madison—I read from his Debates—in that Convention, in speaking to what was proposed as a clause to be inserted in the Constitution, authorizing an exertion of the force of the whole against a delinquent State, spoke in this way:

"He observed that the more he reflected on the use of force the more he doubted the practicability, the justice, and the efficacy of it when applied to people collectively, and not individually. A union of the States containing such an ingredient seemed to provide for its own destruction. The use of force against a State would look more like a declaration of war than an infliction of punishment, and would probably be considered by the party attacked as a dissolution of all previous compacts to which it ought to be bound."

Then he is speaking in reference to a proposed power in the Constitution of the Union, as we have it, to authorize the use of force against a State as such.

Mr. COLLAMER. That was a proposition to carry into effect the Confederation.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; it was in the Convention to adopt the Constitution. But I will not fatigue the Senate by going further into that subject. I stated yesterday that both the majority and the minority of the judges of the Supreme Court by whom the prize cases were decided, expressly negated the idea of any authority to carry on a war or declare a war against any State of the Union. That will be seen first in the opinion of the majority on page 668, 2 Black's Reports, in which, speaking for the court, Mr. Justice Grier, who delivered the opinion, says:

"By the Constitution Congress alone has the power to declare a national or foreign war. It cannot declare war against a State, or any number of States, by virtue of any clause in the Constitution. The Constitution confers on the President the whole executive power. He is bound to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. He is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States. He has no power to initiate or declare war against a foreign nation or a domestic State. But by the acts of Congress of February 28, 1795, and 3d of March, 1807, he is authorized to call out the militia and use the military and naval forces of the United States in case of invasion by foreign nations and to suppress insurrection against the Government of a State or of the United States."

And at page 693, Mr. Justice Nelson, who gave the opinion of the minority, says:

"The acts of 1795 and 1807 did not, and could not, under the Constitution, confer on the President the power of declaring war against a State of this Union, or of deciding that war existed."

And Congress has not undertaken to do it by the two acts referred to by the court or by the act of July 13, 1861. Those acts all profess to act exclusively under the clause of the Constitution which authorizes the employment of force to suppress an insurrection.

The subject has been fully discussed in Congress; on the questions in issue between my friend from Vermont he has said all that can be said on his side, and I have endeavored to say what I could on the other. I shall not, therefore, detain the Senate by any further discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER.]

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the preamble and resolution and insert the following:

Resolved, &c., That the people of no State, the inhabitants whereof have been declared in a state of insurrection by virtue of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved July 13, 1861, shall be regarded as empowered to elect electors of President and Vice President of the United States until said condition of insurrection shall cease, and be so declared by virtue of the law of the United States, or until they shall be represented in both Houses of Congress; nor shall any vote cast by any such electors elected by the votes of the inhabitants of any such State, or the Legislature thereof, be received or counted.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1865.

NEW SERIES....No. 38.

The question being taken by the yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Harlan, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Ramsay, Sumner, and Wilson—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Foster, Hale, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Powell, Sautsbury, Sherman, Stewart, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wright—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Grimes, Harding, Hicks, McDougall, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Sprague, Wade, and Wilkinson—11.

So the amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand that is an amendment by which a part of the preamble was stricken out. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out from the preamble the words "and have continued in a state of armed rebellion for more than three years, and were in said state of armed rebellion on the 8th day of November, 1864;" and in lieu of them to insert, "and were in such state of rebellion on the 8th day of November, 1864, that no valid election for electors of President and Vice President of the United States according to the Constitution and laws thereof was held therein on said day;" so as to make the preamble read as follows:

Whereas the inhabitants and local authorities of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee rebelled against the Government of the United States, and were in such state of rebellion on the 8th day of November, 1864, that no valid election for electors of President and Vice President of the United States, according to the Constitution and laws thereof, was held therein on said day.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose it is in order to perfect the preamble before the question is taken on striking out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order to amend the amendment. The question is not on striking out the whole preamble.

Mr. POMEROY. I propose to offer an amendment to which I think the chairman of the committee will not object; and that is, instead of saying that these States continued up to the 8th day of last November in such a state of armed rebellion that a valid election could not be held, to say simply that they were in such a condition that a valid election could not be held. My amendment is to strike out the words "state of rebellion" and insert "condition." These States were not all in rebellion then; but I will admit that they were in such a condition that they could not vote.

Mr. HOWARD. I had supposed that the amendment suggested by the Committee on the Judiciary, on which we are now again to vote, was simply to strike out a portion of the preamble and not to substitute anything in its place. I perceive that in that respect I was mistaken, and that there is a substitution of other words which satisfy me. I shall therefore vote for the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no right to accept the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, which is only to insert the word "condition" in place of the words "state of rebellion," so as to declare that these States were in such a condition that no valid election could be held. I had no objection to that individually, and as it seems to be more satisfactory to some members of the Senate and does not alter the meaning of the resolution or preamble, I shall not object to it. The preamble, if thus amended, will then read that certain States rebelled against the Government and were in such a condition on the 8th of November last that no valid election could be held. I am satisfied with that as an individual.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not see the propriety of this change. It says they rebelled at such a time and were in a bad condition on the 8th of November. What the condition was it does not state. Was it a bad condition of health?

Mr. HALE. I think the history of the Senate affords a precedent for the phraseology that is to be used here. It was once stated in a certain case on the floor of the Senate that certain members did not belong to a healthy political organization. [Laughter.]

Mr. POMEROY. The object which I desire to accomplish is a simple one. I do not like to state in the preamble what is not true. That the local authorities of these States did rebel against the Government four years ago I have no doubt; but that all of them continued that rebellion up to the 8th day of November last is not true, and there is no use in saying that it is. For instance, in the State of Arkansas—and the same may be true of Louisiana—the local authorities that rebelled have not been inside of the State within a year. Then how could they have been in rebellion in that State on the 8th day of November last? The progress of our armies has been such that they were not there; and for us to say in this preamble that they continued in a state of rebellion up to that time is not true. I am willing to say that the disorganized condition of these States, and the fact that they had not been recognized by the General Government, left them in such a condition that it was not expedient to hold an election. I am willing to say that, because I think that it is true. The other statement is not true, and that is the reason I do not wish to make it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON. With due deference to the Senator from Kansas, I beg to say that it by no means follows because the authorities of the State of Arkansas were driven out of Arkansas, that they are not in a state of rebellion. You might have driven all the inhabitants of Arkansas and all the authorities out, and they still be waging war against the United States. In fact I suppose, as far as the authorities are concerned, that is true—I mean the authorities existing under the Government of Arkansas at the time the rebellion commenced.

Mr. POMEROY. They abandoned the State. The local authority is confined to the State.

Mr. JOHNSON. They abandoned the State because they were driven out of it.

Mr. POMEROY. They were not driven out as local authorities, but as individuals.

Mr. JOHNSON. They could not have been driven out otherwise. Still in point of fact when they were driven out, they were local authorities.

Mr. POMEROY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. And in point of fact they were on the 8th of November in a state of rebellion; that is to say, they were warring against the United States, either collectively or individually. It is not strictly true to the letter that all the inhabitants and all the local authorities of any one of these States were in a state of rebellion on the 8th of November. There were a great many loyal citizens in each one of the States, and there may have been among the local authorities some loyal citizens who were driven by force to take part in the insurrection. But in point of law, as we have already said in the act of July 13th, 1861, and as the President has said in his proclamation issued in pursuance of that act, so far as our power to put down insurrection by force of arms is concerned, they were in a state of insurrection; and then the question comes back whether a State whose inhabitants are collectively for the most part in a state of insurrection (that is to say, are opposing the laws of the United States, and who are supported in that opposition by the local authorities, such as they are,) can elect electors.

Mr. POMEROY. The local authorities to which I referred were the rebel authorities. They never had but one election in the State that I alluded to since the rebellion, and their governor has been killed and the whole thing destroyed. It is not true that these rebel local authorities were in a condition to make war even outside of the State on the 8th day of last November. The real local authorities were loyal Union men; and for us to say that the real local authorities of that State were in rebellion on the 8th day of last November will be saying what is not true. In the first place, the term of office of the old local authorities had expired by limitation; and in the second place, the chief men in that government were not alive to exert any influence if they were disposed to do so. To say that they made war on the Government on the 8th day of last November, or were in a condition to do so, is saying what cannot be true; and that our local authorities made war on the Government is equally untrue. I am willing to say that these parties not having been recognized or countenanced by the Government, were in such a condition that they could not hold an election, and with that amendment I propose to sustain the resolution. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas, and to Senators around me, to avoid any trouble about the recitals in the preamble, that we strike out the preamble and just put the names of the States we intend to exclude from the Electoral College into the enactment and let it go at that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We have had a direct vote on that, and now we are having a controversy about a matter which I am sure if the resolution was printed and laid before Senators there would be no controversy in regard to. The question now pending is simply whether the word "condition" shall be used in place of the words "state of rebellion." The Senator from Vermont thinks it very objectionable because he supposes it may refer to the health of the States in some way. The word "condition" is to be understood in the connection in which it is used; and the previous language of the preamble explains it. It seems to me nobody can misunderstand it who does not want to misunderstand it, with the resolution before him. The preamble now recites that the States of Arkansas, Tennessee, and others, rebelled against the Government of the United States, and were in such state of rebellion that no valid election was held in November last. The Senator from Kansas objects to that because he thinks all those States were not in a state of rebellion on the 8th of November; but he admits that the condition of things was such that no valid election could be held, and he wants to change the words "state of rebellion" to the word "condition." Does that alter the effect of the resolution, or does it alter the effect of the preamble? If it would satisfy the Senator from Kansas, I was quite willing that it should be adopted. I can see no possible objection to adopting his amendment, and then we shall be done with the controversy.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 26, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Chanler, Clark, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Sautsbury, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Collamer, Cowan, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Howard, Johnson, Morrill, Nye, Stewart, Ten Eyck, Wade, and Wright—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Harding, Hicks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Sprague, Sumner, and Wilkinson—12.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to move to strike out the preamble, and insert after the word "States," in the resolution, the names of the States recited in the preamble.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as it has been amended.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is true that yesterday the Senator from Kansas made a motion to strike out the names of those States from the preamble; but he did not move to substitute for the whole resolution and preamble the resolution as it would read with the names of the States in. Merely striking out the names from the preamble, as the Senator from Illinois remarked, left the resolution with no meaning, and therefore some Senators voted against it. But the present proposition of the Senator from Kansas is simply to indicate what is desired, that these States shall not be counted in the College, leaving out the preamble; for there seems to be some difficulty about the recitals in the preamble. This presents the question in a different point of view from that in which it was presented yesterday.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not see what is to be gained by striking it out. It is proposed to take the names of the States out of the preamble and put them into the resolution. Will it be any better then? It is just taking up time. I hope the Senate will adhere to the resolution as it is, and vote down all amendments which are proposed.

Mr. COLLAMER. Without this preamble I do not understand that the resolution states the condition of that country at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. It does not.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am satisfied that a majority of the Senate, as well as of the other branch of Congress, will vote in a few days, and be compelled to vote, for the reception of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Tennessee, and that there is or will be a clear majority in this body in favor of that proposition. It is not true, as stated in this preamble, that the local authorities of the States of Arkansas and Louisiana were not in a situation to cast their votes for President and Vice President either by being in rebellion or by being in "such condition," as my colleague says. They were prepared to vote, and so far as Louisiana is concerned, did vote, for President and Vice President. I want to get rid of the preamble because I do not want to be compelled to take the back track on my own action. By inserting the names of the States in the resolution, as I have suggested, we reach the object desired by the Senator from Illinois, and relieve ourselves from the embarrassment that will be upon us in the contingency I have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to the preamble as that amendment has been amended.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 32, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Cowan, Foot, Johnson, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wiley—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Chandler, Harding, Hicks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Powell, Richardson, Kiddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Wilkinson—13.

So the amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I now move to strike out the preamble, and to strike out after the word "States," in the third line of the resolution, the words "mentioned in the preamble," and to insert in lieu of them "Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee;" and on this amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. As far as the mere object is concerned, which is to exclude the votes of these States, whether the resolution pass in its present form or in the form now proposed makes no difference; but it seems to me singular legislation to resolve that the votes of certain States shall not be counted, without assigning any reason why they shall not be counted. How is the President to know why they should not be counted? How is the House of Representatives to know why they should not be counted? How is the public to know why they are not counted? You have just as much right to say that the vote of any other State in the Union shall not be counted, looking to the face of the resolution alone, if it embraced any other State than those named. It appeared to me individually, and I think it appeared to the members of the committee, as evidently as it appeared to the other House, that when we are excluding certain States from voting we ought to state why we exclude them. For that reason I shall vote against this amendment.

Mr. COWAN. The objection of the honorable Senator from Maryland, I think, is fatal to this kind of legislation. This is not really a law, at any rate; it is simply a decision. Being a decision, it is insisted that the opinion of the Judge shall contain the reasons on which the law is based. It strikes me this ought to be sufficient to show us the fallacy of this mode of legislation. That which we are now deciding ought to be decided next Wednesday in the joint convention. We have got now just to that point when it is evident that this, instead of being a law, is simply a decision legislative in its character.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. We have spent several days here trying to satisfy ourselves that a rule should be adopted for the control of the joint convention that is to meet next Wednesday. Now, I should like to learn from the Senator from Maryland if it is usual to give a reason for a rule to govern legislative action, in this or any other legislative body. We desire to say that certain States shall not be entitled to have their electoral votes counted on next Wednesday, and we desire to say so now, in order to prevent confusion and disorder on that occasion. We have heard from several distinguished Senators that the object is to prevent the recurrence of a disorder that occurred eight years ago in joint convention. Now, sir, I want to save the loyal people of Arkansas and Louisiana and Tennessee from having their feelings further wounded. So far as one of those States is concerned, we drove their Senators from our doors last session. I am one of the men who believe that a State organization is indispensable to the protection of the Union men in those States. I am one of those who believe that the bringing back of any of the seceded States into the Union does more to demoralize our opponents and to close out this rebellion than any other act that we can accomplish. It is worth more than all the victories which can be gained in the field. I want these States brought back; I want to encourage the Union men in all the seceded States when they evince that there is any Union feeling within their borders.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member is mistaken in supposing that this is a mere rule. A rule may be determined perhaps by the convention, or certainly by the concurrent action of the two bodies that constitute the convention. What we propose to do now is to pass a law, to which the President's assent is necessary before it becomes operative, declaring what electoral votes shall be counted legally. If we have the authority to pass such a law—and I do not propose to discuss that question now; I think very clearly we have the authority—when it is passed by both bodies and approved by the President, it is binding on the members of the convention when they meet together. It is therefore no rule; nor is it a decision, as the honorable member from Pennsylvania supposes. A decision of what? It is a declaration which is itself a law that those votes are not legitimate votes. Those who think it has no operation will vote against it in any form; but if it operates at all, it operates as a law. Then the only question with me is whether it is proper in Congress, having authority in certain cases, as I think, to exclude votes of electors, to declare that the votes of any particular State are to be excluded without stating why they are excluded.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland if a concurrent resolution, that does not require the signature of the President, would not be just as potent on this subject as a joint resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON. A concurrent resolution requires the approval of the President.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. A resolution of each branch separately composing the joint convention would be as potent as this law for this purpose.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This preamble contains a recital which meets the views of some gentlemen and is opposed to the views of others, and there are some gentlemen on this floor who have avowed their determination to vote in favor of the proposition to exclude Louisiana upon this other ground, that Louisiana has no representation in Congress, and not having any representation in Congress should not be represented in the Electoral College. The learned Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] based his argument entirely on that ground. It seems to me it would be better, without a recital that these States continue in rebellion or that they continue in any condition, to declare simply, for reasons satisfactory to each one voting for the proposition, that the votes of these States shall not be counted in the Electoral College; and then the preamble would have no embarrassing effect or any entanglement connected with it upon the free action of any member of either House in relation to any other question that may arise whether the members from Louisiana or Arkansas shall be admitted or not. It seems to me that it is wise to strike out the preamble and leave the proposition itself, and then each one who votes for it can satisfy himself with his own reason.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I have persistently voted "nay" on all the various propositions submitted to-day for the amendment of the preamble, although some of them, I believe, are improvements upon the preamble as originally reported. Being opposed to the preamble and to the resolution itself, so far as it affects certain of the States mentioned, it might perhaps, according to the ordinary method of parliamentary proceedings, have been esteemed excusable or proper in me to have voted "yea" on several of these propositions looking toward an amelioration of the charge made in the preamble as to the condition of all these States; but as I am persistently opposed to the whole measure, so far as it applies to at least one of these States, if not more, I think it more consistent to vote "nay" in relation to all these amendments.

Now, sir, if I were not prepared to say that the State of Louisiana or Tennessee was in such a state of rebellion on the 8th day of November last as that there could be no legal election held there, how could I be prepared to say that in consequence of this rebellion, on the 8th day of November last they were in such a condition that they could not vote? I would much rather meet the question fairly and squarely and say that they were in a state of rebellion, than simply to evade the question, and say that they were in some sort of condition that I do not undertake to decide in this high place. I would not strip a State of her rights in this Union without having the boldness to assign a cause.

That consideration regulates and controls my action in my vote on the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Kansas. I am not prepared to vote barely and squarely that these States shall not be counted in the Electoral College, without assigning any reason under heaven for my action. I think it is due to the people there, if there be a corporal's guard of loyal men, that we should assign here the reason why we will not allow them to have an electoral vote cast, after they have endeavored to do all that they could do to resume their position in the Union. I am opposed to the whole proposition from beginning to end, and have voted, and I shall vote, consistently I think, "nay" throughout.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I have not taken much part in this discussion, and do not propose to take much; but I intended to say two or three words before the final vote should be taken on the passage of this resolution, and I believe I may as well say those few words now as at any time.

It strikes me as a most peculiar feature of this debate that we have spent four days, I think, in discussing, not whether we shall pass the resolution or not, but what reason we shall assign for passing it. Ordinarily when you are agreed as to what law you will enact, you are in the habit of putting that in the bill, and looking there for the law and looking into the Congressional Globe for the reasons to be given for it. But to me this whole debate seems very significant that the Senate were conscious that they were about to do an extraordinary thing, and therefore they felt it incumbent on them to assign the reasons upon which they acted with a great deal of care and accuracy, and hence you have been debating for four days as to the question what reason you shall assign for enacting this law. I do not think you have occupied any more time than was absolutely necessary in order to assign a good reason for it.

Mr. President, here is the Constitution of the United States, so it is denominated, declaring that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress." That the Constitution declares. When I came here you required me to step to your desk and take an oath to support it; and now you ask me to vote for a resolution which declares that eleven States shall not vote, shall not appoint electors of President and Vice President. I do not want to do it. I have sworn that I will not do it; or if I have not sworn that exactly before, I swear it now.

Mr. President, that the people living in South Carolina, Georgia, and Tennessee, and those other States, had no right in fact, had no equitable right, to choose electors in November last, I believe; but I believe it because there were no American States there. But you ask me to vote for a resolution which says that they are States, and yet which says that they shall not vote for President. Wherever there is a State in fact, there is the right, and there is the evidence of it, to give a number of votes for President and Vice President equal to the number of Representatives in Congress in both Houses to which that State is entitled. That is my judgment. During the last session of Congress I had occasion to call attention to this very subject, and to say then that it seemed to me the fitting time to fix the relations of these communities before the election was held, before we knew what would be the significance of their action. That was declined. Your law still said those are States; three of them actually did vote, we are told, did choose electors; and now you ask me to vote for a resolution which says that they are States and yet which says that their votes shall not be counted.

And now, Mr. President, look one moment at the reasons which have been assigned. The committee assign for a reason that there was no valid choice of electors in those States in November last. The committee say so; they ask me to say so; they ask the Senate to say so, that there was no valid choice of electors. Sir, is the law-making power of the United States made the judge of what is a valid election of presidential electors? "Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct." The Legislature is made the judge of the manner of choosing electors. It seems to me that the State itself is the final judge as to what is a valid election. There cannot be any other. The right is given in full to the State itself. Therefore I cannot agree to say that there was no valid election in these States. I think it belongs to these States respectively to determine that question.

But if there was no valid election, there was some reason for it. What was the reason? The committee say because the people of those States were in a state of rebellion on that day. That may be, if true, a good reason why a valid election could not be held; but yet, right here in the Senate Chamber, while you are debating this resolution, there is an issue of fact formed as to whether it is true or not. The Senator from Kansas, who has opportunities for knowing the fact as well as any one, and who is competent to testify, tells you that there was no such state of rebellion as prevented the people from making a valid election. That is his testimony upon the question of fact as to which we are at issue. Now, is it not dangerous legislation when you concede that the law you are about to pass depends for its validity on the reasons you assign for it, when in assigning reasons you differ not only upon the law as to what is a good reason, but differ upon the fact as to what reasons exist?

I wish now to call attention to one more remarkable debate we have had. The committee recite these facts as the ground upon which you shall proceed to disfranchise eleven States. They recite them as facts, present them as reasons why you should do it. The amendment which has created more debate than any other was the amendment moved by the Senator from Vermont, the effect of which was mainly to present as a reason for enacting this law, not anything that we affirmed to be a fact, but something that the President has affirmed to be a fact. The committee say, disfranchise those States because their people were in November in a state of rebellion; the amendment moved by the Senator from Vermont asked us to disfranchise the people of those States because the President said they were in rebellion; and that was really the breadth of that issue, as I understood it. If you have a right to disfranchise the people of a State, does it matter whether you and I agree upon the fact for which we do it, or whether we act upon something that the President or some other agent of the Government has said?

It all looks to me as if we were about to pass a most extraordinary law. I shall not vote for it myself, and I shall be extremely sorry to see the Senate pass it, for there it stands side by side with your Constitution, a law declaring in terms that the people of eleven States that you call States shall not vote. I think you might just as well declare that they should not marry. I think you can declare it just as well of the people of one State as another, if you insist upon it that they are States. I know you say that those people have rebelled. Some of them have; but when a man commits murder, can you pass an act of Congress to hang the man that you think has committed the murder? Would you not think that very extraordinary? But is it half so extraordinary as to pass an act of Congress disfranchising the people of a whole State because part of them have committed treason or engaged in rebellion?

But you do not rely upon that; the fact of rebellion you do not insist upon as a sufficient reason for passing this law, and therefore you put in another one. The rebellion is not a ground for disfranchising the people of a State, but the rebellion was the circumstance which prevented a valid election from being held. Why do you want to assign the reason why a valid election was not held? If you are made the judges of what is and what is not a valid election, why do you not say there was no valid election in those States, and let it stand there? It is because you are not made the judges of a valid election that you think it incumbent on you to bolster up your judgment by some very extraordinary reason. This is the way it looks to me. I distrust this whole method of legislating. If you will take hold of the question of the political relations of these communities, and if you will tell what is the truth, and has been the truth since 1861, that there are no State organizations there, no State governments, I am with you. When you establish that, you know what they may and what they may not do.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 7, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Doolittle, Harris, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Van Winkle, and Wiley—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Farwell, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Powell, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, and Wright—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Foot, Harding, Hicks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Pomeroy, Richardson, Riddle, Sprague, Stewart, Wilkinson, and Wilson—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time. It was read the third time.

Mr. WADE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Farwell, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Powell, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Cowan, Doolittle, Harris, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wiley—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Foot, Harding, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Pomeroy, Richardson, Riddle, Sprague, Wilkinson, and Wilson—12.

So the joint resolution was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to take up the joint resolution fixing the duty on paper, and I desire to make this statement to the Senate: there are four bills of a general character from the Committee on Finance which I do not think will excite much discussion; the one I now call up will probably excite the most. I hope the Senate will indulge me in getting these bills passed out of the way, so that they may not clog the business of the session at this late period. One of them is a general appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 141) reducing the duty on printing paper, unsized, used for books and newspapers exclusively.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that its further consideration be postponed to and made the special order of the day for Monday next at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire now to make the same order in regard to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill and the immigration bill. I do not believe these bills will excite discussion, and I want to get them out of the road.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no sort of objection to the order, but the Senator from Ohio must know that he can always get his appropriation bills up by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have been trying for three weeks to get up bills reported from the Committee on Finance, and I have failed until this moment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is only because of the Senator's good nature he has given way. If he will press a vote on an appropriation bill, I never knew it to fail.

Mr. SHERMAN. I insist on my motion to take up the bill to amend the act in regard to immigration.

Mr. POWELL. I hope that bill will not be made a special order for Monday. I have already a special order fixed for Monday at one o'clock. I do not wish to antagonize it with the Senator's appropriation bills, but I am utterly unwilling that it should be put out of the way by this bill about immigration.

Mr. SHERMAN. We can take it up in the morning.

Mr. POWELL. I hope it will not be made a special order for Monday. I would vote with the Senator to fix its consideration for any other day.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to know what the rule is on the subject of special orders. I suppose the rule is that the one first made is the one to be first taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on taking up the bill, not on making it a special order.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will allow this bill to be taken up informally before that motion is put.

Mr. GRIMES. I insist on my motion.

Mr. DIXON. I appeal to the Senator from Iowa to withdraw that motion for a moment for the purpose of permitting me to call up a bill of very great importance to the city of Georgetown, which ought to be passed, and which, I think, will not probably occupy the Senate five minutes; at any rate but a very short time. It is the bill authorizing the city of Georgetown to lay a tax for the purpose of paying their direct tax. With the consent of the Senator from Iowa I will move to take up that bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to make a motion which I believe supersedes all others. It is evident that we are going to do no business to-night. The Senator from Ohio has got one of his bills made a special order, and we all know he can get up the others at any time. It is Saturday afternoon—past three o'clock. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 4, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and agreed to.

UNIFORM WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the National Academy of Sciences be requested to consider and prepare a plan for a uniform international system of weights and measures, and to report thereon on or before the 31st day of January, 1866.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

CIRCUIT COURT IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 641) to provide for another term of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Arkansas, and for other purposes, and moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was read. The first section provides that a term of the circuit court of the United States shall be holden at Little Rock, in the eastern district of Arkansas, on the second Monday in October in each year.

The second section provides that the judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Arkansas may, whenever in his opinion the public interest requires it, hold a term of said court at Helena, at such time as said judge shall appoint by a notice to be published for four consecutive weeks in some weekly newspaper printed at Little Rock, and also in a newspaper published at Helena, if one be published there.

The third section provides that the clerk of the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Arkansas may appoint a deputy, who may exercise the same official powers as his principal; and where the clerk of said district court shall be clerk also of the circuit court for said district, his deputy may act as deputy clerk for both courts. The deputy clerk shall take the oath of office prescribed for his principal, which, together with his appointment, shall be entered at large on the records of the court, and the sureties on his official bond shall be liable for the acts of such deputy. The clerk or judge may revoke the appointment of any deputy at pleasure.

The fourth section provides that in lieu of the salary now paid to the judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Arkansas, there shall be allowed and paid quarterly to said judge, out of the Treasury of the United States, the sum of $3,500 per year.

The amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, which was to strike out the fourth section, was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] will consent to strike out the provision with regard to the holding of a circuit court at Little Rock. The gentleman must see the inconsistency in which he is involving us.

Mr. WILSON. I do not see any inconsistency. This bill proposes to do for Arkansas what has been done for several other States heretofore declared to be in rebellion. At the last session a similar provision was made in reference to Tennessee; and at this session legislation has been had in relation to the circuit court for the district of Virginia. Various acts have been passed at the Thirty-Seventh as well as at the Thirty-Eighth Congress in reference to these States. The judges are there and have been holding courts. They are holding them in Tennessee, and perhaps they are holding them in Arkansas. This is for the convenience of the courts, and for the convenience of suitors. I demand the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I had hoped that we would have some logic in our action.

Mr. WILSON. The logic is that of consistency. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 11; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. WILSON and ENGLISH.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes forty-five, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WILSON demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF SALARY.

Mr. DUMONT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to increase the salary of the judge of the United States district court for the district of Indiana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENROLLMENT OF VESSELS, ETC.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

FEES OF CUSTOM-HOUSE OFFICERS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill to regulate the fees of custom-house officers on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the bill and accompanying letters be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

TREATMENT OF SICK AND WOUNDED SOLDIERS.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Michigan, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas an article appeared in the New York city papers of the 3d instant alleging that "on Thursday of last week a transport filled with sick and wounded soldiers discharged them at the wharf near Fort Schuyler, that they were taken out of their berths on board, carried out upon the wharf and laid there in rows without bed or coverings, exposed to all the bleakness of the January winds, from four o'clock in the evening till midnight; that ten of them died during this time, and that of those who were removed twenty-five died on account of the prostration by exposure before morning;" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the facts of this charge and report to this House as soon as possible.

ARMAMENT ON THE LAKES.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move concurrence in the amendment of the Senate to House joint resolution No. 91, passed at the last session, giving notice for the termination of the convention of 1817 relative to the armament upon the lakes. The Senate have modified the House resolution so as to make it conform to the existing facts, and adopting the notice given by the President; and the Committee on Foreign Affairs recommend that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PEACE.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Whereas it is alleged that informal negotiations are now pending between the United States and the so-called Confederate States with a view to a restoration of peace: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That it is the deliberate and emphatic opinion of this House that no enduring peace can or should be made which shall ever recognize the traitorous leaders of this rebellion as citizens of the United States, entitled to equal rights, privileges, and immunities with the loyal people thereof under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. LE BLOND. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand that the negotiations are no longer pending, that the parties have separated, as nothing admissible was allowed. Such is my information this morning.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. BENNET. I ask unanimous consent to spread the following paper upon the Journal of the House:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON, February 1, 1865.

Representing Territories which must soon become States, as Delegates deprived of the inestimable privilege of voting in this House, feeling a deep interest in the proposition to amend the Federal Constitution forever prohibiting slavery within the jurisdiction of the United States, demanded alike by the exigencies of the times, the voice of the loyal people, and by our efforts in the field to suppress a rebellion inaugurated and sustained for the purpose of perpetuating slavery, we cannot do less than state that the measure meets our unqualified approval.

H. P. BENNET, Colorado.

J. F. KINNEY, Utah.

S. G. DAILY, Nebraska.

CHARLES D. POSTON, Arizona.

J. B. S. TODD, Dakota.

W. H. WALLACE, Idaho.

FRANCISCO PEREA, New Mexico.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

SUPREMACY OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to reestablish the supremacy of the Constitution in the insurrectionary States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SALE OF INDIAN LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, and by unanimous consent, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 92) to postpone and prevent the sale for less than their appraised value of certain Indian lands in Minnesota was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BROOKS moved that the vote by which the resolution was referred be reconsidered, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DUTY ON IMPORTED PAPER.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Ohio, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives in Congress to use their influence for the removal or diminution of the duty on imported paper; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. SCHENCK, also, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives in Congress to oppose the passage of any bankrupt law; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The SPEAKER. Pending that motion the question arises on the motion made yesterday that all debate be terminated in one hour after the committee resumes the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PIKE. It was understood yesterday that this was to be a free debate.

Mr. STEVENS. But I did not understand that it was to be an eternal debate. If the gentleman wishes the time enlarged half an hour longer I will not object.

Mr. PIKE. I suppose the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] wants an hour himself.

Mr. STEVENS. He only wants half an hour. Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I shall probably occupy only fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. I modify my amendment, and make the time one hour and a half.

Mr. HOLMAN. This will terminate only the general debate?

The SPEAKER. That is all.

Mr. PIKE. I ask the gentleman to make the time two hours.

Mr. STEVENS. I will do so; though I am anxious to get at the appropriation bills.

The motion, as modified, was agreed to.

The motion to go into committee was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1866.

The pending question was upon the amendment submitted by Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, being to add the following to the bill:

Provided, That no money appropriated for the naval service shall be expended otherwise than in accordance with the following provision, so far as it is applicable; that is to say, that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a Board of Admiralty, which shall consist of the vice admiral and one rear admiral, one commodore, one captain, one commander, and one lieutenant commander, over which the Secretary of the Navy or the officer highest in rank present shall preside; and when the subject under consideration shall appertain to the duties of any bureau in the Navy Department, the chief of such bureau shall be a member of the board, and entitled to sit and vote on the consideration of the subject.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the board shall deliberate in common and advise the Secretary on all matters submitted by him relating to naval organization, naval legislation, the construction, equipment, and armament of vessels, navy-yards, and other naval establishments, and the direction, employment, and disposition of the naval forces in time of war. All such opinions shall be recorded.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That no vessel-of-war shall be built or materially altered, nor any guns of new construction ordered or adopted, nor any engine for any vessel of-war adopted or ordered, nor any permanent structure for naval service executed, until the plans, estimates, proposals, and contracts for the same shall have been submitted to the board, and its opinion and advice thereon communicated in writing to the Secretary; nor shall any patented invention be bought or adopted for the naval service without first the opinion of the board thereon having been taken; and all experiments decided to test inventions and naval plans and structures shall be conducted under the inspection of the board, or members thereof named by the Secretary, and submitted to the board for its opinion thereon.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That all invitations for plans or proposals for any of the works above mentioned shall be prepared by the board, subject to the approval of the Secretary; and all bids or offers or proposals for the same shall be opened in the presence of the board, and the award made by it, subject to the approval of the Secretary.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary may add to the board, from time to time, other officers of the Navy eligible to the position of chief of bureau, not exceeding three, at any time, for consultation on any of the above subjects. The board may take the opinion of eminent practical engineers, mechanics, machinists, and architects, in their respective branches of art or industry, when in their opinion the public service will be promoted by it, and pay them such reasonable compensation as the Secretary may approve.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon this question the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD and Mr. PIKE then addressed the committee. [Their speeches will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. GRISWOLD. I do not propose to prolong this discussion by considering the amendment which is proposed by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS;] but I feel it due to myself, as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and also as one possessing some knowledge which I am sure the gentleman from Maryland would be glad to be possessed of, to say a word or two upon the question under discussion.

So far as the gentleman's very able remarks were concerned, I, for one, failed to discover that they were really advocating the amendment which he has offered. It seemed to me, so far as his argument was applicable, that it was aimed directly and exclusively, not at the system, but at the men who administer the affairs of the Navy Department. He proposes, by way of rectifying the difficulties which he alleges to exist there, not to remove inefficient or incompetent persons, but, as I understand it, to embarrass and incumber the Department by still greater and still more intricate and minute machinery. Now, it seems to me that if there is any argument at all, the gentleman should have confined himself, not to the theory, but to the manner in which it should be carried out in practice.

The gentleman from Maryland charges upon the Naval Committee, among other things, that it has frittered away its time, and that the bill which he introduced has had no consideration by that committee, partly because the committee has been traveling about the country with reference to locating sites of naval depots. As a member of that committee I beg to have a resolution read by the Clerk, to indicate in some degree how the time of the Committee on Naval Affairs has been occupied during the past and present sessions of Congress.

The Clerk read, as follows:

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 7, 1865.

On motion of Mr. H. W. DAVIS,

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs do investigate, without delay, and report to this House, the facts in relation to the plans and structure of the marine engines constructed and now in course of construction for the Navy; and in what essential particular they differ from the marine engines heretofore used in the Navy and now used in the commercial steamers and the navies of France and England; whether their inadequate power and speed are caused by such differences, and by whose authority and on what experiment, and under whose supervision such changes were introduced; and whether any unfair practices were resorted to by any person in or under the authority of the Navy Department, in the mode of manning or handling the engine of the Pensacola, with a view to break it down and bring it and the plan on which it was constructed into disrepute; and whether any person connected with the Navy Department has received any fees or commission or compensation of any kind from any contractor for engines for the Navy, or compelled any payment of fees for patented improvements to persons not entitled to them, by persons contracting for engines or parts thereof; and that the committee be authorized to require the opinion of the Academy of Sciences on any scientific question involved in their investigations and necessary to be solved in order to arrive at a satisfactory result; and that they have power to send for persons and papers, and leave to report at any time.

Attest: EDWARD McPHERSON,
Clerk.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, in carrying out the instructions of that resolution it is proper for me to say that the Committee on Naval Affairs occupied seventy days in the consideration of the questions alluded to in it; took twenty-two hundred pages of evidence—foolscap paper—and examined in detail and at length no less than forty-two witnesses. Now, I submit to the honorable gentleman from Maryland that this work alone is no inconsiderable item in occupying the time of the Naval Committee, and that this consideration, if no other, should have induced him to withhold anything like censure on the proceedings of the Naval Committee.

Passing over that, Mr. Chairman, and not to dwell on the character of the amendment which the gentleman proposes, I desire to say, for one, that instead of dividing the responsibility, as the head of the Navy Department would be able to do by the creation of the board as provided in the amendment, I believe, looking at it from a practical stand-point, that there is far greater security in holding the Secretary of the Navy and the heads of the various bureaus of the Navy Department to a direct accountability, than in dividing their responsibility.

But I pass over that. In listening to the gentleman's two-hour speech, able and eloquent and ingenious as that gentleman always is, I confess I felt grieved that a member of this Congress should see fit, for the purpose of accomplishing the object which he had in view, to hold up the American Navy, at this critical period of our national history, as being entirely inefficient and powerless; to advertise to the nations of the world that they need have no hesitation as to any interference that they may deem advisable in our affairs, and no fear of any aggression from the Navy of the United States. I regretted to hear it from the distinguished gentleman from Maryland; but, of course, it is not for me to question either the good taste or judgment of that distinguished gentleman.

I should be glad, Mr. Chairman, to go over in detail, and to have read professional and unprofessional statements in regard to the various facts alleged by the gentleman from Maryland; but the shortness of the time allowed to me, and the fact that other gentlemen desire to occupy a portion of that limited time, compel me to refrain from it. I pass over the commentary which the gentleman made on the attack at Charleston, but should be glad to have an opportunity of showing that what he asserted as true, namely, that in that brief encounter half of that little iron fleet was incapacitated for action, was entirely unfounded and destitute of truth. It will be recollected, Mr. Chairman, that the whole iron-clad fleet to which the gentleman alludes as having attacked Charleston on the occasion referred to, consisted only of eight little monitors. They were created entirely, from stem to stern, and completed and put in action, in the brief period of about six or seven months. The whole fleet cost only about as much as any one single ship-of-war built on the old plan. It cost less than one of those iron-clad ships of England, to which the gentleman points with such admiration. The entire number of men employed upon them was one half what is requisite for an ordinary ship-of-war. Instead of that attack exhibiting their incapacity, it is a memorable fact that, though two thousand shot struck that little fleet, yet, instead of being disabled, they were ready to go into action the following day.

But I pass over all these things, Mr. Chairman, and will confine myself more especially to certain representations which were made in regard to the Dictator; and I am sure that the gentleman from Maryland will be glad to be disabused of the errors under which he is resting. I am sure that he will be glad to know that so important an arm of our national defense is not the entire failure which he alleges. I beg to say to him and to this House, in connection with what he has said with reference to the Dictator, that he is entirely at fault. If I remember correctly, the gentleman alleged that the Dictator was built for a sea-going vessel; that she cost an untold amount; that she is incapable of taking coal across the ocean; that her speed is not over five knots an hour; that she is entirely unworthy to be considered a sea-going boat; that in her first passage from New York to Fortress Monroe she broke down; and that she lies to-day a helpless hulk. Now, as I said, the gentleman will be glad to know that upon all these points he is entirely mistaken. So far as the cost of the vessel is concerned, it will perhaps be some satisfaction to him to know that, although she was furnished to the Government at an enormous loss to the builder, the amount which the Government paid for the ship was less than it would now be obliged to pay for her engines alone; that the Government could not to-day duplicate the vessel or build one of anything like her power or capacity for less than $1,000,000 additional to the amount they have paid for her; and that the loss has come out of the pockets of individuals, and not out of the Treasury of the Government.

Now, sir, so far as her capacity for coal is concerned, she is capable of storing seven hundred and fifty tons, (to attain seven knots per hour she requires three thousand pounds of coal, or thirty-two tons in twenty-four hours,) a supply for twenty-five days, and adequate to a distance of forty-two hundred miles. I speak now of the actual running of the vessel, and make no assertion that cannot be vindicated by the record. Thus much for her capacity for fuel.

As to her sea-going properties, I desire to read a very brief extract from a letter received from Superintending Engineer W. Cosgrove, dated "On board the Dictator, Hampton Roads, Virginia, January 8, 1865." In concluding his report, he says:

"It blew a gale of wind yesterday, with a heavy sea on, and we went through like a pilot boat, part of the time in company with a good-sized steamer that seemed to be laboring heavily, while we were not heeding either wind or tide. It is really a magnificent sight to see the Dictator in a sea-way."

In regard to her speed, the passage from New York to Fortress Monroe was made under positive instructions not to exceed eight knots per hour—a very proper prudential restriction to be placed on the running of new and very heavy machinery. She went from New York to Fortress Monroe without a consort, and encountered very rough weather; yet in that first passage she attained an average speed of nearly eight knots an hour. Instead of her machinery breaking down, and the vessel lying now a helpless hulk, the whole difficulty arose from the fact that in the main shaft a defect was discovered: one of those defects in forging which no human skill or foresight can guard against, and which can be detected only by the test to which the machinery was subjected.

The defective shaft has been replaced, and the vessel is now, or will in a very short time, be ready for any service that she may be called upon to perform. Allegations have been made as to the steering qualities of the vessel. Upon this point it is sufficient to say that, while this has been regarded as an unavoidable defect in all the iron-clads of England and France, no vessel afloat, iron-clad or other, responds to the rudder more promptly and with less power than the vessel in question.

The London Times of December 24 publishes an account of a recent experimental trip of the new British iron-clad Achilles. Under a full pressure of steam this vessel required twenty-one men at the rudder, while the Dictator requires but two. The Achilles requires for her turning a circle of three thousand feet; the Dictator seven hundred feet, or about twice her length; an achievement that will be regarded as a marvel by the naval architects of the world.

In short, Mr. Chairman, I allege without the fear of contradiction that the indications tend to prove that the Dictator is as perfect a sea-going vessel as has yet been built for the American or the navy of any other country, and that there is not a single particular in which she fails to realize the utmost expectations of those who were most sanguine in regard to her. With the indications of speed which she has already exhibited, her utter impregnability to all ordnance yet devised, and with the capacity of carrying a fifteen or twenty-inch gun, and hurling against her adversary a solid shot of four hundred and fifty to six hundred pounds, she may well defy any—I had almost said all—of the ships-of-war that can be brought against her.

This, sir, is the vessel which the gentleman from Maryland would consign with so much nonchalance to the obscurity of a failure. We are told that with a board such as is proposed by the bill under consideration, instead of constructing vessels of this class we shall have copied the models that have been furnished by our transatlantic friends across the ocean; this, too, in face of public acknowledgments, after the memorable conflict at Hampton Roads, by the chief constructor of the British navy and by members of the British Parliament, that the navy of England was a failure, and that the fact had been demonstrated in America that the power of a navy consisted not in the number of guns, but in their size.

Before the conflict of iron-clads alluded to, the highest authority of England pronounced with a tone of entire confidence that it was impossible to construct a ship-of-war impregnable to modern ordnance. Well, sir, we have had no Boards of Admiralty to discuss and decide as to the plans of ships-of-war, but have appealed to the unlimited and unfettered genius of our country. I require no stronger proof of the correctness of our policy, and of the objections to the plans proposed by the bill under consideration, than the fact that we have stepped out of the beaten channel, broken loose from the trammels which have tied down the inventive genius of other lands, and by one bold step placed this nation far in advance of every other in a position either for offense or defense in naval warfare that secures us against all interference from foreign Powers.

Mr. Chairman, I have occupied more time than I intended, and now yield to the gentleman who desires to occupy the residue of the time assigned to this debate.

Mr. BLAINE. How much time is left for debate, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Three minutes and a half. Mr. BLAINE. I had desired and intended, Mr. Chairman, to speak ten or fifteen minutes on this amendment, but the members of the Naval Committee have consumed the time to such a degree that I am deprived of the privilege. Of the five hours and a half allowed for debate, that committee has occupied more than four; and since the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] concluded his remarks, four gentlemen have been heard in succession on the same side of the question, a mode of proceeding quite unprecedented in this House, as I am well assured.

The discussion, sir, has been somewhat at cross-purposes as between the gentleman who opened the discussion and the four gentlemen who have in succession replied to him. A specific proposition to establish a Board of Admiralty was introduced by the gentleman from Maryland as the effective remedy for evils in the administration of the Navy Department, which evils he proceeded to expose in a caustic, scathing, truthful, and deserved criticism, spending his hour thus, and devoting little time to the practical merits and fitness of his proposed remedy. The gentlemen of the Naval Committee, finding it easier to oppose a Board of Admiralty with objections borrowed from English experience than to answer the charges of short-coming and blundering in the Navy Department, so forcibly put by the gentleman from Maryland, have dexterously expended much of their time in exposing the inefficiency of the proposed remedy, and have thus skillfully avoided an answer to the great essential points made by the gentleman who moved the amendment. For myself, sir, I confess that I care very little for the particular measure pending. I support it because it proposes a change, and a change must be a reform. To adopt it is to declare that Congress is not satisfied with the mode in which the Navy Department has been administered; and to reject it is in effect to assert that the House of Representatives, so far as it has cognizance and control of the matter, will advise the President that this Department shall be conducted in the future as it has been in the past, and that the officers of the Department may again spend $10,000,000 in the construction of twenty iron-clad vessels that will not stay on top of the water!

Mr. PIKE. The assertion is wholly incorrect.

Mr. BLAINE. It may be denied, but it has been proved. It is indeed a matter of public, general, and undisputed notoriety that twenty of these iron vessels, built under the supervision of the Navy Department, will not float, at least those that have been tried will not, and the model is the same for the whole number.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maine may be permitted to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot entertain that proposition, as the debate in Committee of the Whole was closed by order of the House, and it is not competent for the committee to extend it.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the first line; that will entitle me to the floor a few minutes longer.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the reading of the amendment.

The amendment, which was read, was to strike out the following words:

That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. I have stated a fact in regard to those twenty iron-clads which cannot be controverted, and—

Mr. PIKE. I say the gentleman is entirely mistaken in reference to the building of those twenty monitors.

Mr. BLAINE. They are not sea-going.

Mr. PIKE. They were never intended to be sea-going.

Mr. BLAINE. I say they will not float. What is meant by floating? Is not the phrase simple enough and plain enough?

Mr. STEVENS. I will say that an engineer told me the other day that not one of them would float until $120,000 more had been expended upon each of them.

Mr. PIKE. The first of them, launched in Boston harbor, floated three inches out of water on a level, though she was intended to float twelve inches. Others floated high enough, and when altered make useful vessels.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the first lost nine inches.

Mr. PIKE. She did.

Mr. BLAINE. That is, she lost seventy-five per cent. of that portion of her which was designed to be above water. And this, I presume, is the best of the whole twenty! Well, sir, that is conceding the whole case. Only three inches above water! Why, the chances are that she could not be towed a mile in smooth water without sinking to the bottom!

One or two other facts I must notice hurriedly, as I shall be compelled to yield the floor in a moment. Much has been said by the members of the Naval Committee about the speed of the vessels built for what is termed the new Navy. One official fact is a better answer to these allegations than anything I can say. It is this: that out of ninety British steamers caught within a given period in attempting to run the blockade, only twelve were caught by vessels built by the present administration of the Navy Department, while seventy-eight were caught either by purchased vessels or vessels inherited from the old Navy. I submit, sir, that this fact bears with crushing force on the practical question of the speed and efficiency of vessels of the new Navy. It is a fact derived from official sources, and its significance can neither be denied nor evaded.

I was struck with a remark made by a member of the Naval Committee who quoted from one of those remarkable reports of Admiral Porter, written from Fort Fisher, in which the admiral, indulging in some very high blowing about the merits of a certain monitor, states, in conclusion, that she could cross the ocean, storm all the fortresses of England and France, and after laying their cities under contribution and playing havoc generally on a very large scale, could recross the ocean in perfect safety, provided she could get coal! A very important proviso truly—if she could only get coal, in some mysterious way entirely unknown to the authorities that ordered her construction!

Mr. PIKE. The criticism upon Admiral Porter is unfair. He meant she could carry coal enough to cross the ocean but not enough to return. Hardly any vessel can do that.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh! I presume after laying London under contribution, some of the obliging coal-heavers at Greenwich would supply her as a matter of international courtesy.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a point of order. Is it not out of order for these loyal Republicans to quarrel among themselves? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot entertain that as a question of order.

Mr. STEVENS. Their enemies are so nearly crushed that they can afford to do that.

Mr. BLAINE. A word more, sir, and I am through. My candid and conscientious belief is that this House should in some form, emphatic and unmistakable, and at the same time parliamentary and courteous, say to the country and to the President that we are not satisfied with the administration of the Navy Department. If today we follow the lead of the Naval Committee, we vote an approval of what has been done in this blundering construction of vessels that will not float, and so far as the expression of our opinion can have influence and weight we ask the continuance of the same administration of affairs for the next four years. For myself I am not willing to give any such vote. I believe there should be a change. I cast no reflections, no aspersions, on any man; but I deal simply with facts known and read of all men, facts which have gone upon the record and which cannot be denied or concealed. I am not competent to say where the precise responsibility of the costly blunders may rest, but I feel a profound assurance that the passage of this measure will enable us to find out. I shall vote, therefore, with great pleasure, for the amendment moved by the gentleman from Maryland.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. RICE of Massachusetts, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 43, noes 55.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the special order, the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1866, had instructed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the bill by inserting after line one hundred and forty-nine, among the appropriations for the Boston navy-yard, the following:

For the purchase of land adjoining the Boston navy-yard, $135,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I make the point of order that this amendment contains an appropriation, and must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEVENS. It was considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and was ruled out. [Laughter.] I now offer the same thing in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the amendment is in order. The 120th rule declares that—

"No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government."

It is the opinion of the Chair that the navy-yards of the United States are public works; that, when it is desired to extend them, they are public works in a state of progress; that is to say, that Congress has not determined that they are finally completed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is not the ground of the point of order. The point of order is that, under the rule, the amendment must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that the amendment is in order to be presented in the House, but that it must be considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in accordance with the rules, before it can be incorporated in the appropriation bill. Rule 112 is positive that—

"All proceedings touching appropriations of money shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House."

It is the opinion of the Chair, and it will be the opinion of the House unless the decision is appealed from, that this is in order as an amendment to the bill, but that it cannot be voted upon in the House, but must first be discussed and considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, if any member makes objection to its consideration in the House now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the objection.

Mr. STEVENS. I offer the following as an additional amendment:

For the purchase of ground adjoining the Brooklyn navy-yard, $102,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the same point of order upon that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment must first be considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEVENS. Then, for the purpose of considering these two amendments, I move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order. My point of order is, that the bill is out of the committee, that the committee has been discharged from its consideration, that it has been reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, and that it is not in order to go back into the committee for the purpose of considering amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is in the power of the House to recommit a bill as often as it pleases to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. But the gentleman's motion is not a motion to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood it.

Mr. STEVENS. I meant that. I move now that the bill, with the pending amendments, be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SPALDING and CORFORD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 35.

So the bill was recommitted to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move that all general debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill and amendments be closed in five minutes.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is not in order. The bill has not yet been considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. It has been considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and general debate has been terminated upon it. The Chair therefore thinks that the five-minutes debate only will apply in the committee, although it is a new question, which has never been raised before.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does that apply to both amendments?

The SPEAKER. It does, and to any amendments that may be offered to the bill in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The bill generally having been debated, the closing of debate is a question as to which a majority of the House must decide.

Mr. WILSON. Does the closing up of debate apply to the amendments?

The SPEAKER. The five-minutes rule will apply to the amendments, and to any amendment that may be offered.

Mr. WILSON. I will suggest to the Chair that if that is to be the rule, all that the Committee of Ways and Means have to do, in order to shut off debate on appropriation bills, is to report one appropriation only in a bill, and, after that has been considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and the bill reported back to the House, have it recommitted with amendments embracing the whole body of appropriations.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no doubt about it; but I withdraw the motion to close debate.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 91) to terminate the treaty of 1817, regulating the naval force on the lakes; when the Speaker signed the same.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SCHENCK in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1866, and of the amendments offered thereto, as follows:

Insert the following:

For purchase of land adjoining the Boston navy-yard, $135,000.

Insert the following:

For purchase of ground adjoining the Brooklyn navy-yard, $102,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I raise the question of order that this bill, being recommitted, must be considered de novo. I call for the reading of the bill in extenso.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the position of the bill to be this: after having been considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it was reported back to the House, and in the House two amendments were proposed, and the whole bill recommitted with the amendments. That being the case, the Chair decides that the bill must be read, and that the whole question is open as if the bill were now referred to the committee for the first time.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not rise to appeal from the decision of the Chair; but what has been already decided in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union cannot be reconsidered in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may be mistaken as to the point of fact; but the Chair understands from the Clerk that the bill was recommitted with the amendments. If the bill has been recommitted, the Chair is still of opinion that the bill must be read.

Mr. STEVENS. For the purpose of considering amendments, of course.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. For the purpose of considering the whole bill.

The bill and amendments were read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do I understand that these amendments are now pending, without the bill being read by sections for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that, the bill having been considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and reported to the House, and having been recommitted, together with amendments offered in the House, those amendments must be acted upon, and then the bill taken up clause by clause and considered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope this amendment as to the Boston navy-yard will not be adopted. At the last session of Congress the House passed a proposition of the same kind. The Senate struck it out of the bill, and the House afterward by a vote of 56 to 38 concurred in the action of the Senate. It did so on facts which were then exposed to the House as to the entire absence of any necessity for the purchase, and on account of the extraordinary and profligate price proposed to be paid for the land. For the purpose of getting all the facts before the committee that were before the House at last session, I ask for the reading of the affidavit of the original seller of the property to the present owners. The present owners are Messrs. Oakman & Eldredge. They purchased it of Gustavus V. Hall not more than a year ago for $55,000, to which is to be added $6,000 for improvements, making the cost of the property to the present holders $61,000. They propose to realize a profit on the sale to the Government of $74,000.

The Clerk read, as follows:

I, Gustavus V. Hall, of Charlestown, in the county of Middlesex and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, on my oath say, that late in February, A. D. 1864, I was present at an interview between Mr. Oakman, of Charlestown, and Mr. Hittinger, who sold him a wharf in said Charlestown, called Brinnall's wharf, wherein said Oakman told Mr. Hittinger that he paid a large price for the wharf, and that he would sell it back at any time within a year, if the Government did not take it, as he expected, for $10,000 less than he gave for it.

GUSTAVUS V. HALL.

Boston, April 27, 1864.

Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Suffolk, ss:

Personally appeared Gustavus V. Hall, above named, and made oath that the foregoing affidavit, by him signed, is true.

Before me, JOHN Q. A. GRIFFIN,

Justice of the Peace for all Counties.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I ask the Clerk to read the following affidavit of the person who sold this property for $55,000, to which improvements worth $6,000 have been added, making $74,000 profit proposed to be paid for this property:

I, Jacob Hittinger, of Belmont, in the county of Middlesex, and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, on my oath, say: that I sold the wharf known as Brinnall's wharf, at said Charlestown, the third wharf situated westerly of the original line of the navy-yard; that I sold said wharf in the month of December, A. D. 1863, to Oakman & Eldredge; that I executed the deed thereof to them in the month of February, A. D. 1864; that I received therefor the sum of $55,000. Oakman & Eldredge had been lessees of said wharf under a lease which had expired about six months before said sale in December, and perhaps earlier; and they were occupying at the time of the sale in December under an agreement for an occupancy of one year after the expiration of said first lease. Their occupancy, I think, was to terminate, by the terms of our agreement, about May 1, A. D. 1864. Oakman & Eldredge offered to sell me all the improvements they had put upon the premises and deliver them to me, including scales and railroad and all else, for $6,000; but I did not buy them for the reason that I thought the property not worth so much. On the day the deeds were passed, Mr. Oakman told me he would give me $10,000 to take the property back if his proposed sale to the United States failed, or was not consummated for any reason. Before this sale, I had owned this wharf twelve or fifteen years; had done business upon it; and for some eighteen years had done business on wharf property in that immediate neighborhood. I sold this because I thought I got a good price for it, and I had no other reason for selling it. Before the sale I had frequent conversations with Oakman & Eldredge about selling it to them, and their objection to buying it was that the price asked and finally paid was too great, and that the wharf was not worth it. They also said it was of less value than Caswell's wharf adjoining, which they had bought of Messrs. Lawrence & Sawyer.

JACOB HITTINGER.

Boston, April 27, 1864.

Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Suffolk, ss:

Personally appeared, Jacob Hittinger, above named, and made oath that the foregoing affidavit by him signed is true.

Before me, JOHN Q. A. GRIFFIN,

Justice of the Peace for all Counties.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be perceived, from these affidavits, that this property actually cost these parties $61,000, and the profit proposed to be given them is the sum of $74,000. Now, for the purpose of showing more completely and entirely the want of any necessity for making this purchase, I ask that the Clerk shall read the following extract from a leading Republican paper published in Charlestown:

"The affidavits of a large number of the most experienced and competent men were furnished that the portion of the wharves proposed to be sold for $135,000 would be dear at $30,000; that the portion retained from the two wharves by Oakman & Eldredge was worth as much or more than that they proposed to sell; so that they would keep at least one half of the value they bought for $104,000, and sell the other half for $135,000! This evidence came from owners of wharf property in the same neighborhood, from merchants, from wharfingers, from wharf-builders, from gentlemen who own and sell real estate, in fact from the best citizens of the town having knowledge of practical affairs. But this was not all. The proofs summoned by the mayor established that many thousand feet of unsurpassed wharf property could be constructed on the premises already owned and inclosed by the Government, at cheaply at least, if not more cheaply, than that involved in the proposed sale could be repaired or and made fit for Government use and occupancy. This testimony came from many sources, and among other deponents concerning it were certain officers in the navy-yard, of high character for integrity and good judgment and skill in their departments of the public service. The affidavits embracing these facts, and also setting forth the manner in which the sale to the United States of wharf property would affect the city of Charlestown, in withdrawing from commerce and from taxation property so greatly needed for both purposes, were by the mayor laid before the Senate, that had yet to pass upon the appropriation of $135,000, which had gone through the House, wherein it had been advocated by Massachusetts members, and opposed only by Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois."

Mr. HOLMAN. I have but a single additional fact to which to call the attention of the committee, and that is this: that these same parties, Oakman & Eldredge, in 1862, since the war began, have, I believe, sold property to the Government, for the purpose of increasing the capacity of this navy-yard, to the extent of $123,000. That is to say, within the last three years we have appropriated $123,000 for the purpose of enlarging the navy-yard at Charlestown. It is now proposed to enlarge it by paying to the same parties the sum of $135,000. And it will not escape the attention of the committee that the purchase of this land was made for the express purpose of selling it to the Government. It is sold to these parties and purchased by them for the express purpose of selling it to the Government; and those parties now propose to sell back to the parties from whom they purchased it this property at a loss of $10,000, unless they are enabled to drive this bargain with the Government. These are the influences which are at work to force this upon the Government of the United States. I do insist that there is no evidence before this House, and never has been, that there was any necessity for this purchase, or that the capacity of the navy-yard at Charlestown was insufficient; but at the same time it is really true that the attempt to sell this property is influenced, not by a desire to promote any public interest, or for any purpose of enlarging the navy-yard, but to promote the private interest of these parties, who have already realized a handsome profit from the Government by the sale made in 1862. I trust the House will not make this appropriation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to add only a word to what has been already said by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in regard to this subject. This whole question was up during the last session of Congress, when the proposition was introduced here. After it had passed, the patriotic and loyal citizens of the town of Charlestown, property-holders, men of the highest respectability, embracing all the city authorities, brought the subject to the attention of Congress, a committee came down here to protest against the purchase of this land, upon the ground that it was utterly unnecessary for the purposes of the navy-yard, and upon the further ground that the price was extravagant and outrageous; a piece of land which the party had bought for $61,000, and for one half of which the Government had agreed to pay $135,000. When the bill went to the Senate with this provision in it the Senate struck it out, and it came back to the House. I was not present during the debate, but it was fully debated here, and the House concurred with the Senate in striking out this provision by a vote of nearly two to one. I do not know what new facts have been brought forward which should justify us now in reviewing the action which we took at the last session of Congress upon a full and thorough investigation and understanding of the whole matter.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not intend to consume the time of the committee by any further discussion. I remember the discussion of last year, one party alleging that these affidavits were all from interested men, and the other that they were from disinterested men. Under those circumstances I had very little to say upon the subject, and cared very little about it. The mayor of Charlestown contended that that town would be very much injured if this purchase was made by the Government, while the Government said they must have it. I understand that he went before the people upon that question at the late election, and he was left out. This is not exactly record evidence, but I understand such to be the fact. However, the committee, after a full examination of this question, after having the chief of the bureau before it, have reported that it is absolutely necessary that the Government should make these appropriations for both these navy-yards. But all I mean to say upon this subject is to ask that the Clerk will read a communication from the bureau, so as to show that the Committee of Ways and Means acted upon proper grounds in this matter.

The Clerk read a communication from Joseph Smith, of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, of the Navy Department, recommending that the purchase be made.

Mr. STEVENS. In order that we may not consume the remainder of the day in discussion, I move that the committee rise, for the purpose of closing general debate.

Mr. WILSON. Before the gentleman makes that motion will he permit me to make a statement?

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw the motion, and yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, the value of this property has been stated at various sums by parties interested and those who are not interested; and I think it is very difficult for this committee to make up a judgment as to what the property is really worth. Several of the citizens of Charlestown are certainly of opinion, as is shown by affidavits and statements forwarded by them to committees of this House and to members, that the price asked is exorbitant.

Now, sir, in order to avoid difficulties of this kind in relation to all cases, I wish to state that I hold in my hands a bill, which I am authorized to report to the House whenever I can get an opportunity so to do, extending the provisions of the act of April 19, 1864, in relation to the condemnation of private property upon Rock Island to all cases wherein the Government may desire the appropriation of private property for public use. That bill will provide simply "that the provisions of an act entitled 'An act in addition to an act for the establishment of certain arsenals, approved April 19, 1864,' be and the same are hereby extended to and shall be construed to apply to all cases wherein the Government of the United States may deem it necessary to appropriate private property, being real estate, to the use of the Government, and in relation to which the Government and the owner or owners of such property may not be able to agree upon the price to be paid for the same; provided that the board of commissioners provided for in the third section shall be appointed by the circuit court of the circuit in which the proceedings are to be had."

Now, sir, this will provide a means whereby the Government may ascertain by a jury, in a court of competent jurisdiction, the just and fair value of such property as it may deem necessary to appropriate to the public use. I hope, therefore, inasmuch as there is this difference of opinion in relation to the value of the property in this case, that this amendment may not be adopted, but that we shall abide by what may be the result of the action of Congress in relation to this system for the condemnation of private property for public use.

Mr. STEVENS. If I were sure that such a bill would pass in this House and the Senate, I would not urge the amendment. In order to provide for the possibility of such an act being passed, I propose to modify my amendment by adding to it the following:

Provided, That if an act shall be passed at this session of Congress providing for the condemnation of private property for public use, the appropriations herein contained, providing for additions to the navy-yards at Boston and Brooklyn, shall be imperative and void.

I now move that the committee rise, for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask the gentleman not to move that debate close immediately after the House again resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole, but that twenty minutes or half an hour be allowed for debate. The measure which I proposed has been grossly misrepresented by every gentleman who has spoken upon it, and my desire is to put it intelligibly before the House, not to repeat my previous argument or to restate facts which I have already presented, and which have not been answered.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCHENCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration, as a special order, the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1866, had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. When the House was acting upon this bill a few moments ago, there was a point raised as to the right to close debate, which the Chair stated was doubtful. The Clerk will read from page 62 of Barclay's Digest.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The proposition to close debate may be made at any time, taking precedence even of a motion to go into Committee of the Whole; but to be in order at all, the subject upon which it is proposed to close debate must have been previously taken up and considered by the committee."

The SPEAKER. As this subject has previously been considered by the committee, the Chair is still of the opinion formerly expressed with reference to the right to close debate.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that when the House again resolves itself into Committee of the Whole upon this bill, all debate on the pending amendment be closed in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resume the consideration of the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SCHENCK in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, the naval appropriation bill.

The amendment of Mr. STEVENS, with the modification proposed to be added by him, was read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I make the point of order that the gentleman cannot modify his amendment so as to include an appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot modify his amendment, but must move it as an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. Very well, then.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offered this amendment in the House. I made the point of order that it contained an appropriation which must be first considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the Speaker sustained that point of order.

Mr. STEVENS. The Speaker ruled that my amendment was in order, but that as it contained an appropriation it should have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Then I moved to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has now taken testimony on both sides, and as he understands the fact, when this amendment was offered in the House the Speaker decided that it was in order as germane to the bill, but that it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The bill and pending amendments were then referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The question is now on the amendment as offered in the House and referred to the committee, and it cannot be modified except by an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move it as an amendment to the amendment.

The amendment and the amendment to the amendment were again read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is to pass, I want it to pass so that we may have a chance to see whether we cannot save something. I do think when the House has fully and deliberately considered a question of this kind and decided against it, that it ought not to stultify itself by now passing it. The gentleman spoke of the gentlemen from Charlestown who came down here. The members here who know those gentlemen say that they are of the highest character. Mr. Griffin is a distinguished lawyer, and was the competitor of one of the present members of Congress from that State. He came down here and I had a conversation with him. He said that he was influenced solely by a desire to serve the public interest, and that he could not remain silent and see the Government swindled as it was proposed to swindle it by this appropriation. He told me some other things in regard to it which are not proper for me to state here.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted. The amendment, as amended was then rejected.

The next amendment was read, as follows:

For the purchase of ground adjoining the Brooklyn navy-yard, $102,000.

Mr. STEVENS. As the other amendment has been rejected, I will withdraw this one.

Mr. ODELL. I object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment cannot be withdrawn unless by unanimous consent.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will take this occasion to say that, by the authorities, when a bill is thus recommitted with amendments pending which have not been confirmed by the action subsequently of the House, all that has been done in the committee falls to the ground. The bill, therefore, will be taken up as originally reported from the Committee of Ways and Means and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose there will be no objection to considering the amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union heretofore adopted as applying to this bill.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the bill was open to further amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to insert the following, which was ruled out of the bill when it was in committee before:

For pay of clerks in the ordnance department at the several navy yards, in lieu of the present per diem pay, viz:
For salary of one clerk at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, navy-yard, $1,200.

For salary of one clerk $1,200, and one at $1,000 per annum, at Boston navy-yard, $2,200.

For salary of one clerk at $1,200 per annum, and one clerk at $1,000 per annum, at the New York navy-yard, $2,200.

For salary of one clerk at the Philadelphia navy-yard, $1,200.

For salary of one clerk at $1,400, one clerk at $1,000, one draughtsman at $1,600, one analytical chemist at $2,500 per annum, one assistant pyrotechnist at $1,400, and one keeper of magazine at $480 per annum, at the Washington navy-yard, $15,180.

Mr. HOLMAN. When the bill was in committee before, the point of order was made that those paragraphs contained independent legislation and were not for carrying out the existing law, and that point of order was sustained. It is now proposed to insert the very matter that was then ruled out. I make the point of order, first, that it is not competent for the gentleman to move to insert those words already stricken out; and secondly, if it is competent to do so, it is independent legislation and not in order to an appropriation bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I offered the amendment as one necessary to carry on one of the Departments of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana to make the point of order that that portion of the bill having been ruled out when the House was in Committee of the Whole before, that no other ruling can now be had upon that part of the bill. The Chair overrules the point of order. Whatever occurred in the Committee of the Whole before has now no validity, but falls to the ground. The Chair will have read from Barclay's Manual the ground upon which he bases his decision.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"After a bill has been committed and reported, it ought not, in an ordinary course, to be recommittees; but in cases of importance, and for special reasons, it is sometimes recommittees; and usually to the same committee. If a report be recommittees before agreed to in the House, what has passed in committee is of no validity; the whole question is again before the committee, and a new resolution must be again moved as if nothing had passed."

Mr. HOLMAN. The other point I now make is that the amendment now submitted contains independent legislation, and that it is not for the purpose of carrying out any existing law. And upon that point I desire to have a precedent read. It was decided in a Committee of the Whole upon this very point raised.

Mr. STEVENS. This comes in under the ruling of the Speaker.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that when the House was in Committee of the Whole before, the ruling of the Chair was that that portion of the bill was not in order, as it was not for the purpose of carrying out any present object or law. As all that was done in the committee before has fallen to the ground, and there is no precedent, and this presents itself as a new question, the Chair will rule that this being a provision for carrying on one of the Departments of the Government is in order. Therefore he overrules the point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As the Chair has ruled the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be in order, I desire to call the attention of the committee to what the amendment is. I did not expect my strict construction ruling, in order to save money to the Treasury, would be the law of this House; but I made it a law to myself. This amendment provides for increasing the salaries of the clerks at certain navy-yards. That brings up this whole question of the increase of salaries; and the committee has got to decide now whether it is willing, in the present state of the country, to enter upon this work of increasing salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that any amendment has been offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The clause which the gentleman from Illinois is now commenting on, being already in the bill, a motion to insert it is not requisite. It would be in order for the gentleman from Illinois to move to strike it out or to amend it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As I understand the matter, the occupant of the Chair, when the House was last in committee, decided that what the gentleman from Pennsylvania now offers as an amendment was not in order; and it was ruled out of the bill. No appeal was taken from that decision, and hence the decision stood, and that clause is no part of the bill. Hence, as it is no part of the bill, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires that it shall be, he now moves to amend the bill by inserting it.

The CHAIRMAN. When the House was in committee before, it was ruled that all that latter portion of the bill was not in order, on the ground that it was not for carrying out any of the operations of the Government, or anything provided for by law. But everything that was done in that previous Committee of the Whole having fallen to the ground, the bill is now considered the same as if it never before had been in Committee of the Whole. It does not need, therefore, any motion to restore that provision to the bill. But a motion can be made to amend it, or to strike it out. The Chair decides that the clause under consideration is already a part of the bill, and is before the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As the Chair rules that the matter proposed to be inserted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is already a part of the bill, I move to strike it out.

It changes the existing law by increasing the salaries of the clerks at the various navy-yards, how much I do not know. There is nothing in the present bill to show what their salaries are now. In terms, the clause provides for paying to the clerks in the ordnance department at the several navy-yards, in lieu of the present per diem compensation, the several sums mentioned in the clause, as follows: to one clerk at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, $1,200; to one clerk at Boston, $1,200, and to another $1,000; to one clerk $1,200 and to another clerk $1,000, at New York; to one clerk at Philadelphia, $1,200; and at the Washington navy-yard to one clerk, $1,400; to another, $1,000; to one draughtsman, $1,600; to one analytical chemist, $2,500; to one assistant pyrotechnist, $1,400; and to one keeper of magazine, $480. I would be glad to know what the present per diem allowance of these various clerks is.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was stated on a former day when this measure was before the House that the per diem was $3 50. It was so stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] or by some other gentleman upon this floor.

Mr. STEVENS. Only some of them.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would be glad to know how many of them received a per diem, and what salaries the other clerks received. I think we are acting very much in the dark in this matter.

I think, sir, that if we are going into this business of raising salaries we should not go into it by piecemeal, but should go over the whole subject fully and fairly. I am opposed, first and last, to any increase of the salary of any person employed under the Government; but if we are going into it, let us go into it fairly and justly, and do justice to all parties systematically.

Mr. PRUYN. I wish to call attention to an error in the footing up of these appropriations. The amount is footed up fifteen thousand and odd dollars. It should be $8,380.

Mr. STEVENS. I did not foot it up myself. It was done by the clerk. I ask that it be corrected.

The correction was made.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to suggest that while we are increasing these salaries—and I think we must do it in order to enable these men to live—there should be some stipulation that the increase shall continue only during the suspension of specie payment, because at the end of the war and the resumption of specie payment we shall otherwise have enormous salaries imposed upon the country.

I observe that in the appropriation for the publication of the American Nautical Almanac there is an increase of salary provided for. I think that there should be some limit to the increase, and that it should continue only during the suspension of specie payment. With that proviso, I am quite willing to vote for this increase.

Mr. STEVENS. The Department have asked for this, not as an increase of salary, but as a change from a per diem to a permanent salary in most cases, and have fixed it at the lowest rate of salary, $1,200. The number of clerks is increased in some instances. There is one added at Philadelphia. And then they appoint one clerk at $1,400, which is not intended as a general rule, the general rule being $1,200; but this being a clerk of class second as clerks are classified in the Departments, they say that this is necessary to command the talent required to carry out these departments, and the Committee of Ways and Means thought it only reasonable, and so reported it.

Mr. BROOKS. In the case of the American Nautical Almanac we have increased the salary, and I have no idea that a scientific man, at the present rates of currency, could be obtained to do the work without that increase, but after the resumption of specie payment the increase of salaries ought not to continue.

Mr. STEVENS. It will be very easy to adjust the matter when that time arrives.

Mr. BROOKS. In order to test the sense of the House, I will move to add the following proviso to the clause proposed to be stricken out:

Provided, That the increase of salaries contained in this act shall continue only during the suspension of specie payment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that that time may be pretty far distant, and that he had better fix upon some time, say the 1st of July, 1867.

Mr. BROOKS. I would not stake my sagacity on that as the period of time for the resumption of specie payment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New York by striking out "during the suspension of specie payment" and inserting in lieu thereof "after the 1st day of July, 1867."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Illinois that there are two amendments already pending, and that an amendment in the third degree is not in order.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to have what is said by the Department on this subject read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The above salaried clerks are required for the proper performance of the duties of the ordnance department of the different yards. The ordnance stores and accounts were formerly kept in charge of the storekeeper, but are now entirely confided to the ordnance officer. This change of system and the vast increase in the labors of the ordnance department make it absolutely necessary that persons of ability and responsibility should be permanently attached to the ordnance office for the performance of the clerical and other duties connected therewith.

"The salaries are fixed at the very lowest amount at which it is thought possible to secure competent persons. The salary asked for the draughtsman is about the same as the pay now received by him.

"The services of a skillful analytical chemist are greatly needed in the ordnance department of the Navy. For want of such a person the department has frequently to resort to outside parties, and often suffers for want of chemical analysis and information, which, if furnished, would be of great service to the Government. Instead, therefore, of a pyrotechnist, who has been heretofore employed, the bureau ask for a skillful analytical chemist and an assistant pyrotechnist. The keeper of magazines has heretofore been estimated for by the Bureau of Yards and Docks.

"H. A. WISE, Chief of Bureau."

The question was taken on Mr. Brooks's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The question being on Mr. WASHBURN's amendment, the Chairman ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and GARFIELD.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, nays 40.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the bill:

Provided, That no money appropriated for the naval service shall be expended otherwise than in accordance with the following provision, so far as it is applicable; that is to say, that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a Board of Admiralty, which shall consist of the vice admiral and one rear admiral, one commodore, one captain, one commander, and one lieutenant commander, over which the Secretary of the Navy or the officer highest in rank present shall preside; and when the subject under consideration shall appertain to the duties of any bureau in the Navy Department, the chief of such bureau shall be a member of the board, and entitled to sit and vote on the consideration of the subject.

Sec. 4. And he it further enacted, That the board shall deliberate in common and advise the Secretary on any matters submitted by him relating to naval organization, naval legislation, the construction, equipment, and armament of vessels, navy-yards, and other naval establishments, and the direction, employment, and disposition of the naval forces in time of war. All such opinions shall be recorded.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That no vessel-of-war shall be built or materially altered, nor any guns of new construction ordered or adopted, nor any engine for new vessel-of-war adopted or ordered, nor any permanent structure for naval service executed, until the plans, estimates, proposals, and contracts for the same shall have been submitted to the board, and its opinion and advice thereon communicated in writing to the Secretary; nor shall any patented invention be bought or adopted for the naval service without first the opinion of the board thereon having been taken; and all experiments decided to test inventions and naval plans and structures shall be conducted under the inspection of the board, or members thereof named by the Secretary, and submitted to the board for its opinion thereon.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That all invitations for plans or proposals for any of the works above mentioned shall be prepared by the board, subject to the approval of the Secretary; and all bids or offers or proposals for the same shall be opened in the presence of the board, and the award made by it, subject to the approval of the Secretary.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary may add to the board from time to time other officers of the Navy eligible to the position of chief of bureau, not exceeding three at any time, for consultation on any of the above subjects. The board may take the opinion of eminent practical engineers, mechanics, machinists, and architects, in their respective branches of art or industry, when in their opinion the public service will be promoted by it, and pay them such reasonable compensation as the Secretary may approve.

The amendment having been partially read—

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, said: Mr. Chairman, I have heard enough of that amendment read to make me quite certain that it is out of order. Although when it was first offered the committee decided it to be in order, yet I believe it to be so flagrantly out of order that I raise the question again. I desire to say that I am in favor of the proposition, and would vote for it in the House; but I object to it because it is out of order. If we establish a precedent of this kind, there is nothing under heaven that cannot be got into a general appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order cannot be properly raised till the amendment is before the committee; but as the gentleman from Illinois has anticipated, the Chair will decide that so much of it as has been read is in order. The Chair overrules the point of order so far as the amendment has been read. The further reading may disclose what will render the amendment out of order. The Clerk will proceed with the reading.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I do not insist on the reading of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that it is not in order to stop the reading of an amendment.

The reading of the amendment was concluded. Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Has the Chair decided the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the remainder of the amendment is in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] having offered the amendment just read, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] raises the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill. The Chair overrules the point of order, and from that decision the gentleman from Illinois takes an appeal. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCHENCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1866, had come to no resolution thereon.

REPRESENTATION IN ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College, in order that the House may concur in the amendment made by the Senate.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was taken up, and the amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out of the preamble the words "and were in such condition of armed rebellion for more than three years;" and insert in lieu thereof:

And were in such condition on the 8th day of November, 1864, that no valid election for electors of President and Vice President, according to the Constitution and laws thereof, was held therein on said day: Therefore.

Mr. YEAMAN. I desire to offer a substitute for the joint resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I desired to demand the previous question on the amendment.

Mr. YEAMAN. I object if I am not allowed to offer a substitute.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move to go to business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. YEAMAN. I withdraw my objection and offer the following substitute for the joint resolution:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the votes of the presidential electors of any State shall be counted when presented and verified in the ordinary and legal method; and it is incompetent and immaterial for Congress to go behind such verification, and inquire whether a part of the citizens of such State may have been in rebellion; and all laws and parts of laws and joint resolutions incompatible with this are hereby repealed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I raise the question of order that the amendment is not germane to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The only matter before the House is the Senate amendment; and any amendment, to be in order, must be germane to that. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky would be in order to the original bill, but is not in order to the Senate amendment.

Mr. YEAMAN. I offer it as a substitute for the matter before the House.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution has been passed upon by both Houses, and is not susceptible of amendment, except so far as applies to the amendment of the Senate. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky is not in order.

Mr. WILSON. I demand the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded.

Mr. COX moved that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the main question; and being taken, the main question was ordered.

The question was then taken upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate, and it was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the House concurred in the amendment of the Senate; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. No. 94) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to advance to Paul S. Forbes $250,000 additional, out of the sum to be paid him under his contract for building a steam screw sloop-of-war, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate had passed the joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College, with an amendment, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

MANITOWOC, WISCONSIN.

Mr. ELDRIDGE, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, to the Congress of the United States, in relation to the improvement of the harbor of Manitowoc, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MARRIAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would call the attention of the House to the fact that the bill in relation to marriages in the District of Columbia, introduced on yesterday by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] was by mistake referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia. If no objection is made the bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

No objection was made, and the bill was referred accordingly.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. WHALEY, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That rule 102 be amended as follows: In line one strike out "seven," and insert "eight." At the end of the rule add: "A committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relate to the Department of Agriculture."

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules; which was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, (at four o'clock and thirty minutes, p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday next.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 6, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 641) to provide for another term of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Arkansas, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CREDENTIALS PRESENTED.

Mr. POMEROY presented the credentials of Hon. JAMES H. LANE, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Kansas a Senator from that State for the term of six years, commencing March 4, 1865; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

Mr. MORRILL presented the credentials of Hon. NATHAN A. FARWELL, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Maine a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. William Pitt Fessenden in the term which will expire on the 3d of March, 1865. The credentials were read, and the oath to support the Constitution having been administered to Mr. FARWELL, he took his seat in the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. POMEROY. I now present the petition which I submitted on Saturday from Mr. E. Bloodgood Beebe. Having read the petition, I see nothing in it which should deprive him of the right of petition, although what he asks is a very foolish and unwarrantable thing. The petition being respectful and well got up, I can see no reason why it should not be presented. I think we have no appropriate committee to which to refer it, and I ask that it lie on the table.

Mr. GRIMES. What is in it?

Mr. POMEROY. The petitioner desires that the opposing armies in the United States shall combine and fight the French out of Mexico, and then take Cuba and Canada, and by that time he thinks the Union will be so consolidated that they never will fight each other any more.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. I present a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, in favor of a bill establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, in which, speaking of the bill now before Congress, they say:

"Though admitting of improvement in several respects, the bill in its general outline and provisions seems drawn with signal ability and with a wise regard alike for the true interests of debtor and creditor, and your committee regard its passage as eminently desirable."

As the bill has been reported from the committee and is before the Senate, I move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of merchants of the city of New York, praying the passage of the bill for the construction of a national ship-canal from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Daniel J. Browne, agent to visit various parts of Europe to investigate and report on the production, manufacture, and commerce of the flax and wiles of European countries, praying that an investigation may be had in relation to the exercise of unwarrantable power of one officer over another, and that he may be compensated for detention and loss of time, which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. DIXON presented the petition of merchant tailors of Hartford, Connecticut, and those engaged in the millinery and cloak-making business, praying that a specific tax may be imposed on each of those classes of work beyond a certain exempted amount of each, and that the internal revenue law may be modified accordingly; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOWARD presented two petitions of citizens of Berrien county, Michigan, praying that one or more of the southern States may be set apart as a home for colored people; which were referred to the select committee on slavery and the treatment of freedmen.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of J. Owen, praying the repeal of the act entitled "An act to regulate the admeasurement of the tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States;" which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GRIMES presented a petition of officers of the United States Government employed in the navy-yard in Washington, District of Columbia, praying for an increase of salary; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HOWE presented a petition of citizens of the county of Manitowoc, Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of the Manitowoc river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the improvement of the harbor of Manitowoc, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented the petition of Andrew J. Gray, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a communication from J. G. Knapp, in relation to the transmission of printed matter and seeds through the mails to the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. COWAN presented the petition of military officers in the service of the United States, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. NESMITH presented the petition of Albert J. Meyer, praying for an acknowledgment of his services in the invention and use of plans of signals in the military and naval service, and that he may receive the reward in rank and emoluments to which those services entitle him; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. POMEROY presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Wyandott to the southern boundary of the State, and that the title of the Cherokee Indians to certain lands in that State be extinguished; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of Anselm Richard, praying for indemnification for depredations committed by the armed vessels of France on commerce owned by his father prior to the year 1801; which was ordered to lie on the table, the bill commonly called the French spoliation bill being pending.

Mr. SUMNER. I have in my hand, Mr. President, a petition most respectfully signed by citizens of Boston, in which they ask Congress to enact a law preferring for appointment to all inferior offices persons honorably discharged from the military service of the United States who shall have served for a period of three years during the present rebellion, or who shall have suffered permanent disability while in the service, or who shall have been held for one year as prisoners of war, and that the tenure of such offices be for life or during good behavior. This petition is most respectfully signed, as I have said; indeed, I have rarely offered a petition where the names were more entitled to consideration. They are among the most eminent citizens of Boston. There is no committee to which this subject can appropriately be referred, but I would state that some time during the last session I introduced a bill, which is now upon the Calendar, to revise the civil service of the country in order to secure a better class of officers. That bill has never been called up for consideration, nor, as I have said, is there any committee to which the subject can be referred; but as the persons in interest are in the largest number connected with the military service of the country, I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Commissioner of Patents, transmitting the annual report of the Patent Office for the year 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 2d instant, a copy of the report of the Provost Marshal General, accompanied by copies of all papers in the possession of the War Department, relating to the quota of the State of Rhode Island under the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces and the acts in amendment thereto; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of January 16, 1865, a report of the board of commissioners of the Soldiers' Home, accompanied by certain statements which, with Senate Executive Document No. 52, second session Thirty-Seventh Congress, contained the information concerning the Soldiers' Home called for in that resolution; which was laid on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement showing the expenditures of the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the military establishment for the year 1864; which was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) in relation to certain railroads, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 406) for the benefit of officers of the Army in the field, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the Mechanics and Traders' Bank of New Orleans, praying that the Secretary of the Treasury may be authorized to return to that bank the amount of money paid on dividends to stockholders in the city of New York by order of Major General Butler, which had been previously confiscated in the hands of the bank by agents of the rebel government, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WADE, from the committee on the conduct of the war, who were directed to inquire into the facts and circumstances concerning the attack on Petersburg on the 30th of July, 1864, submitted a report, which, with the accompanying testimony, was ordered to be printed. A motion of Mr. ANTHONY, to print five thousand extra copies, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

TRADE WITH INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. COLLAMER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate whether, since the 2d day of July last there have been granted to any individuals other than agents of the Treasury, any orders, permits, or licenses to buy, sell, control, or in any way to deal in cotton or produce in the seceded States, and if so, what has been the nature and extent of such licenses or permits; and to whom the same have been granted, and at whose solicitation, and what orders have been granted to military authorities to aid the same; and further to inform the Senate what rule of preference has been adopted as to the persons to whom such permits or licenses, if any, have been granted, whether any and what consideration has been paid for such personal and valuable privileges, and under what law such licenses or permits, if any, have been granted.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) in relation to certain railroads was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

AGRICULTURAL CENSUS REPORT.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred the following resolution, have directed me to report it back to the Senate without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That two thousand copies of the agricultural part of the Census Report for 1860 be printed for the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. POMEROY. We have acted on a resolution of that character, during the absence of my colleague, offered by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HARLAN.]

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. This is that resolution. It was not acted upon by the Senate, but was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and is now reported back by them.

Mr. POMEROY. I thought it was passed by the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Should not that resolution go to the Committee on Printing? I think so, according to our rule.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no; it is a report from a committee.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. This resolution is reported back from the Committee on Agriculture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the consideration of the resolution at this time? The Chair hears none, and it is now before the Senate.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. There is a letter from the Commissioner of Agriculture on the subject, which I ask to have read.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 1, 1865.

SIR: I desire to ask the especial attention of your committee to the importance of having two thousand copies of the agricultural part of the report of the Census Bureau printed and given to the Department of Agriculture for the purpose of distribution to its chief correspondents of the condition and amount of the crops and farm stock. The necessity of this will be seen at once when your attention is drawn to the fact that the preliminary census report contained the summary of all the crops and stock for each State, but did not give the returns for each county. The correspondence of this Department consists of a chief and five assistants, the latter being farmers residing in different parts of the country. Through this organization the Department obtains information, the importance and reliability of which is now generally conceded, and the accuracy of this information is becoming greater as the correspondents become more experienced. Their zeal, too, keeps pace with that experience. For this information they receive no other compensation than a copy of my reports and some papers of seeds. Their labor is great, and they have often expressed their wish to have this report.

Apart from the fact that these persons are rendering this important service, and that this service will become more valuable with the census returns of each county before them, there are no persons who would appreciate so highly the agricultural statistics of the report asked for, or who would disseminate it around them so much. I trust, therefore, that the request of a copy for each of the chief correspondents will meet with your approbation.

With much respect, your obedient servant,

ISAAC NEWTON, Commissioner.

Hon. JAMES HARLAN.

Acting Chairman Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It would be well to inform the Senate that the committee have information that the type is not yet distributed; the work is still in type.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is the Senator from Kansas prepared to state the cost of the publication? Has there been an estimate?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. No, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is customary for the Committee on Printing, and, indeed, the rule requires it, to obtain, before reporting a resolution for printing a work, an estimate of the cost. I preferred that this resolution should go to the Committee on Agriculture, because I thought that that was a more proper committee to consider it, the Committee on Printing having already reported in favor of printing the number they thought proper, without taking this into consideration. I think it would be better for the Senate to know precisely what the cost will be before acting upon this matter. It could be obtained in a short time from the Superintendent of Public Printing; and, indeed, I intended to ask him myself and inform the Committee on Agriculture upon the subject, but it escaped my memory.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have no objection to having the resolution referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not wish, to have it referred to the Committee on Printing; but I think we ought to know what it is going to cost before we vote for it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. In order that that information may be had, I will move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is not necessary. If the Senate will let the resolution lie over until to-morrow, I can obtain the information.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Very well.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to make a single remark. I suggest to gentlemen, as the expense of printing this report of the Census Bureau will be very heavy at the present price of material, labor, &c., whether it would not be advisable to take some portion of the numbers already printed which have not been distributed, and give them to that Department, instead of making a new edition of two thousand copies. I desire to have the information suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island, but I think when the information is obtained we shall hesitate about incurring this very great additional expense.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Let the resolution lie over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will lie over.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 429) to establish additional offices for the assay of gold and silver, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 430) to amend "An act to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATION AMONG THE STATES.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 108) to provide for submitting to the several States an amendment of the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have the resolution read at length for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of such Legislatures, shall become a part of the Constitution, to wit:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to the number of male citizens of age having in each State the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. The actual enumeration of such citizens shall be made by the census of the United States.

I ask the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I content myself with remarking that that amendment, or something like it, seems to become necessary now since the adoption of the other constitutional amendment by which slavery is prohibited throughout the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That reference will be made.

CONFERENCES WITH REBELS.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish to the Senate any information in his possession concerning recent conversations or communications with certain rebels said to have been under executive sanction, including communications with the rebel Jefferson Davis, and any correspondence relative thereto.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I object. I want to have that information, but I wish to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over, under the rules.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 97) to terminate the treaty of 1811 regulating the naval force on the lakes; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no further morning business, the unfinished business of the morning hour of Saturday is now before the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 411) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia," the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. SUMNER to add the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the provision prohibiting any exclusion from any car on account of color, already applicable to the Metropolitan railroad, is hereby extended to every other railroad in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SAULSBURY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DIXON. I wish to say in regard to this amendment, that I opposed it on Saturday on the ground that it seemed to conflict with the rights of another company not now before the Senate; but since that time I have seen the managers and controllers of that company, and find that they are unwilling to contend on this subject with what they considered to be the public opinion. They therefore make no objection to it; and I shall make none.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I do not wish the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am requested to state that my colleague [Mr. WILKINSON] is confined to his room by indisposition.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Fairwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Henderson, Hendricks, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Saulsbury, Van Winkle, and Wright—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Hicks, Howe, McDougall, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Wilkinson—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT TO ENROLLMENT ACTS.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 408) in addition to the several acts for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILSON. It will be remembered that the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, in the nature of a substitute for the original bill, was read when the bill was up before.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. WILSON. I hope it will be adopted at once.

Mr. GRIMES. If that amendment be adopted, will it then be susceptible of amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not in the text. Additional sections may be added, but if the text of the amendment is amended it must be before its adoption.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following:

That from and after the passage of this act, any person enrolled and liable to be drafted, may be accepted as a substitute for a drafted person, and such drafted person shall be exempt from service for such time as the substitute shall be held to service under the terms of his enlistment.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That no person owing military service shall be exempted from liability to perform the same on account of furnishing a substitute for the Navy, unless the substitute is presented in person to the board of enrollment by which the principal is enrolled, and is accepted by said board of enrollment.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That any recruiting agent, substitute broker, or other person, who shall enlist, or cause to be enlisted, as a volunteer or substitute, any insane person or person in a condition of intoxication, or a deserter from the military or naval service, knowing him to be such, or who shall defraud or deprive any volunteer or substitute of any portion of the State, local, or United States bounty to which he may be entitled, shall, upon conviction by any court-martial or military commission, be fined not exceeding $1,000, or imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of such court-martial or military commission.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That any officer who shall muster into the military or naval service of the United States any deserter from said service, or insane person, or person in a condition of intoxication, knowing him to be such, shall, upon conviction by any court-martial or military commission, be dishonorably dismissed the service of the United States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all State and local bounties hereafter to be paid to any volunteer or substitute upon entry into the military or naval service of the United States shall be paid in installments, as follows: one third at the time of the muster into service of such volunteer or substitute; one third at the expiration of half the term of service; and one third at the expiration of the term of such service, unless sooner discharged by reason of wounds received in battle. And in case of his death while in service, the residue of his bounty unpaid shall be paid to his widow, if he shall have left a widow; if not, to his children, or, if there be none, to his mother, if she be a widow.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the remainder of the term of service of any person who shall hereafter enter the military or naval service as a volunteer or drafted man, and shall desert therefrom, or be discharged by reason of physical disability, existing prior to such entry into service, shall be added to the amount of service due from the district to which such volunteer or drafted man shall have been credited, and the same shall be filled up from such district by enlistment or draft.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the other lawful penalties of the crime of desertion from the military or naval service, all persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States, who shall not return to said service or report themselves to a provost marshal within sixty days after the passage of this act, shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship, and their rights to become citizens; and such deserters shall be forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, or of exercising any of the rights of citizens thereof, and all persons who shall hereafter desert the military or naval service shall be liable to the penalties of this section.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized and required forthwith, on the passage of this act, to issue his proclamation setting forth the provisions of the preceding section.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to strike out the fifth section of the amendment. I am not able to see either the policy or the right of the proposition contained in that section. I do not see what the Government of the United States has to do with bounties that are paid by State, county, or other local authorities. That is a matter altogether between the local authorities and the volunteer. What right have we to prohibit a State or a county or a city from paying the entire bounty down? I do not care to discuss the matter, I merely make the motion to strike out the section.

Mr. WILSON. Before this provision was inserted in our amendment, the members of the Military Committee consulted some of the most eminent lawyers in the Senate, and they agreed that we had the power to do it. So much for that objection. Now, in regard to the provision itself, there is certainly no way to enforce it unless the Government should conclude not to muster into service any person thus enlisted. I do not object to striking out this section, and I was inclined to do so in reporting the bill from committee; but it is very evident that the local bounties are the means rather of filling quotas than of filling up the Army. The enormous bounties that have been offered by individuals and local authorities have been carried to an extent that rather induces men to desert than to go into the Army and serve. I shall not, however, oppose the striking out of this section.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. I offer by way of amendment this additional section:

And be it further enacted, That every soldier who shall have enlisted in any regiment or battery previously organized, under a distinct promise or assurance given by the recruiting or mustering officer, or by the Governor or adjutant general of the State where such soldier enlisted, that such enlistment should only be for the unexpired term of service of such regiment or battery, shall be entitled to his discharge at the expiration of such term, anything in the mustering-in roll of such soldier to the contrary notwithstanding; and if such regiment or battery shall have been mustered out of the service, such soldier shall be entitled to be discharged forthwith. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, subject to the approval of the President of the United States, to immediately provide all proper rules for carrying this provision into effect.

I suppose it is hardly necessary to explain the design of this amendment, for I imagine every Senator has been besieged by applicants who have been mustered into the service, through some misapprehension of the recruiting or mustering officer, for a longer term than the soldier enlisting really supposed he was engaging to serve the country. It makes no difference, as to the justice and necessity of such legislation as is asked for by the amendment, whether the recruiting officer or the officer mustering the soldier in acted under an honest misapprehension of his duty, or whether he acted fraudulently; it is a fraud upon the soldier entering the service. Many regiments have thus been filled up, and it was desirable that they should be thus filled for the purpose of serving out the term for which the regiment was originally enlisted. The recruiting officer held out the inducement to men, that if they would enter the service for the remainder of the term for which the regiment was enlisted, they, too, should be discharged at that time; and it is operating very unjustly and very harshly on men who have thus been entrapped into a longer term of service than they supposed they were undertaking to render at the time they enlisted. It seems to me this amendment proposes no more than absolute justice. I have almost daily petitions and applications from various portions of the Army, from men who have been thus entrapped into the service, complaining of the injustice and hardship of their position, and I trust it will be the pleasure of the Senate to give them a relief so manifestly right and expedient.

Mr. BROWN. I trust the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from West Virginia will not be adopted, for I think it will have the effect of breaking up the Army altogether. It will do more to demoralize and destroy it than perhaps any other amendment that could be placed on the bill. I have received numerous applications from persons who say that they were enlisted for a shorter term, or that false representations were held out to them by persons connected with enlistment; but certainly we cannot afford to set the precedent here of permitting all the statements of all the agents, all those who have assisted in enlisting men into the service, to override the laws of Congress and the regulations of the military service. There would be no use in establishing laws, no use in providing regulations, no use in instructing officers, if the laws, regulations, and instructions are to be overthrown and destroyed at the will and option of any officer who sees fit to violate them by making a promise beyond those that he was authorized to make by the Articles of War and by the regulations of the service.

I say that if this amendment were adopted the result of it would be that it would put it in the power of any officer and any man colluding to operate to discharge that man, and it would also in nine cases out of ten go to effect the release of men who do not deserve to be released.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think there is a joint resolution of the Legislature of Indiana on this subject upon the Secretary's table, before him. If so, I should like to have it read. If I recollect it aright, it expresses the desire of the Legislature that a proposition such as is submitted by the Senator from West Virginia should be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary informs the Chair that no such document is on his table.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe such a memorial or resolution from the Legislature was presented to the body through the Presiding Officer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If so, it is on the files of the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I know that the Legislature has adopted such a memorial, and my judgment is with the proposition; because it is certainly very hard to make men serve a term of three years when they were induced by the recruiting officer to suppose that they were entering the service for the unexpired term of the regiment. It has occurred in many cases. The Secretary of War has authorized the discharge of one company where the company entering the service under like circumstances were mustered in according to the understanding. Certainly the claim of those who were mustered in contrary to their understanding, to their bargain with the Government, is as strong as the claim in the other case. I wished merely to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the State of Indiana, which has furnished her full quota of troops at all times during the war, has expressed a desire that a proposition such as is submitted by the Senator from West Virginia should be adopted.

Mr. WILLEY. I do not see the force of the objection made to this amendment by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN.] The amendment itself provides that these discharges from service shall be made under such regulations and rules as the War Department shall prescribe, and it will be perfectly competent and within the power of the War Department to make rules and regulations that will obviate all danger of improper discharges and of fraud upon the service by procuring the discharge of men on false pretenses. Certainly it is not the desire of the amendment to lead to any such effect as that; but the object is the contrary; it is to do justice to men that through the regularly-appointed agents of the Government have been deceived into a service which they in point of fact never engaged to render; and now I say it is but justice on the part of the Government to relieve the men that have thus been entrapped into the service of the country either through ignorance or through the fraudulent agency of the officer. I do not think it will demoralize the service to do justice to men who are in the service; nor do I apprehend that the operation of this amendment will go to the extent supposed by the Senator from Missouri. That quite a number of men have thus been enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States I admit, and it is on their behalf that I speak; but that it will demoralize the Army, that it will tend to break up the service, I have no apprehensions at all. I think the tendency of it will be rather to strengthen that arm of our service, and the confidence of the country and of the men already enlisted in the service, and of those we expect to enlist in the service, if they see a readiness on the part of the Government to do justice to men who have fulfilled their actual engagements in the service of the United States and to the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order of the day.

Mr. WILSON. I hope that will be passed over until we act on this bill. It is of great importance to pass the bill if we are going to have a draft.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. WILSON. I think we can pass this bill in a short time.

Mr. POWELL. If my bill, which was made the special order for to-day, does not lose its place, I have no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the special order be passed over informally.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the special orders will be passed over informally, subject to be called up at any moment. The bill of the Senate (No. 408) is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the question being on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia to the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. I am opposed to this amendment, and I believe it will have a most disastrous effect if adopted. In the first place, no man had a right to make any such promise as is here spoken of. If any man made such a promise he made one which he had no right to make, and made it for deceptive purposes. In the next place, the papers show that the men were mustered in for three years, and they signed the muster rolls on which that was expressed, thus agreeing to go in for three years. No man in the country was authorized to take them for any less time; but it has become a universal complaint of men who enlisted and went into old regiments that their time should expire with that of the regiment. There is no authority for it. If you put such a provision in the bill you will have a clamor all over the country to release all the men whose regiments have gone home. These men received their bounty for three years, and they are in the service. Here and there possibly a man was deceived; but not one was deceived where you will find a hundred who will claim that this promise was made to them.

I think the adoption of this amendment will have a very disastrous effect. We had better stand on the law as it is, and hold the men responsible to what they agreed, what they took bounty for, what the papers they signed stated. I dare say that some recruiting agents deceived men in this matter, as they have in many others, and the bill before us is intended to bear heavily on the substitute brokers and others who are enlisting men all over the country, and cheating them beyond measure. Many a man has been enlisted under the promise of $1,000 or $1,200 or $1,500 bounty who has received scarcely a farthing, while the substitute broker has pocketed the money. I saw a man the other day, a man of character, of standing, of family, a business man, who, while passing to New York, was drugged, and did not get over it for ten days, and when he did, found himself put in the service of the United States, with the promise of $1,200, of which he got $100. We have any quantity of these things going on in the country. I am opposed to the amendment, and in favor of this bill, for the reason that it is intended to correct some of these abuses.

Mr. GRIMES. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is mistaken as to a statement of fact. It is true that enlistments have been made, as has been stated by the Senator from West Virginia, with the approbation and under the direction of the War Department for the purpose—

Mr. WILSON. They had no right to do it.

Mr. GRIMES. I say that it is true that under the direction of the War Department enlistments were made for the purpose of filling up the unexpired term of regiments that had been in the service for six or twelve months at the time when these recruits were obtained. The Senator says that the War Department had no right to do any such thing. Are we going to repudiate the action of our agents in a matter of this kind? Are we going to say that these men, notwithstanding the representations that were made to them by the War Department, shall be compelled to fulfill a contract which they did not make? Is it not better, more manly, more generous, and more noble for us to impose draft after draft, and let these men be discharged according to the stipulations that our agents made with them at the time they enlisted?

Why, sir, I happen to know that in the State of which I am a citizen authority was given to the Governor of the State, and the adjutant general, to make this representation in order to fill up some three-year regiments, one year of whose time had already expired, and the men who were thus recruited have been discharged by the authority of the War Department, between certain dates; but the persons who were enlisted by the same agents in Iowa, one, two, and three days before the first date named in the order of the War Department, and two, three, and four days after the last day in it, are still retained in the service, the representation made to these recruits having been made by the same authority, by the same officers, and in the same manner. There is not anything that is more manifestly unjust. It seems to me that there is not anything more calculated to demoralize the service than to keep these men in the service after the time for which they enlisted and agreed to serve, under the direction and according to the agreement entered into between them and our own agents.

Mr. BROWN. If I understand the operation of the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, it will be simply this: that the enlistment of every soldier in the Army shall be opened up to be explained by him as to any contract, understanding, or agreement made between him and a recruiting agent or officer. I say if that door is opened, it lays your service open to be demoralized utterly. If, as the Senator from Iowa says, you are to assume that the person has been enlisted with the agreement that his term should expire when the term of the regiment expires; if that is to be carried out, and you are to discharge him, why shall you not carry it further, and say that if a soldier has been enlisted under a promise that he shall be made an officer, under a promise that he shall go into a specific branch of the service, under a promise that he shall be in the artillery, or cavalry, or any other different branch from that in which he is; why shall not he also be discharged because of the failure to carry out that promise? Is not the promise as specific in the one case as in the other? May not the inducement be as great to him to enlist in the one case as in the other? And if you are going to open up the question of enlistments to be deter-ined and interpreted by private understandings and arrangements that have been made by officers who had no authority to do so, why will you stop at the one point and not proceed to the other? Why will you say that the one promise shall be carried out and not every promise shall be carried out?

It seems to me there is nothing in the character of the amendment to commend it to those who are anxious and solicitous to maintain the force and effect of our armies. I trust that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. CONNESS. There is a more serious objection in my mind to this amendment, which is, that it deprives you of the old regimental organizations. It was argued when these enlistment bills were before us on former occasions that the great gain we were to receive was from placing new troops in old organizations. Now, sir, if you have your regiments composed of veterans and more newly enlisted men, and the latter class are to be discharged when the term of service of the former shall come to its termination, simply, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri, upon the basis of private understandings, how are you going to preserve the framework of your regimental organizations? Who are to be your veterans in these regiments? How are you to educate your newly enlisted men? How are they going to become effective in the field? In fact, if you adopt the rule suggested by this amendment, it appears to me that in every respect you adopt one that could not be followed except by the destruction of your armies.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The State of Indiana seems to feel a good deal of interest in this question, and I feel it to be my duty to read very briefly from the memorial of the Legislature upon this subject. This memorial states the facts, and upon these facts I cannot see how any Senator can vote against discharging these men:

To the Senate and

House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The General Assembly of the State of Indiana respectfully beg leave to memorialize your honorable body upon matters herein set forth, and which your memorialists deem of great importance to many citizens of the State, and to which your immediate attention is earnestly requested.

Prior to the 1st of January, 1863, the ranks of the old regiments then in the field had become so greatly decimated by hard service and frequent engagements with the enemy, that it became necessary, in order to preserve such organization, that a general anxiety was felt, both by the people and the authorities, that they should be speedily filled up with recruits.

This anxiety greatly stimulated enlistments, and the prospect of serving in companies with experienced comrades encouraged volunteering.

The men thus recruited in the State of Indiana had the full understanding that they were enlisted for the unexpired time of the old organizations into which they were mustered, and that they would be mustered out of the service at the expiration of the original term of service of such old organizations.

In this understanding the volunteer, the recruiting officer, the State authorities, and the people, fully participated, and in the absence of any order from the War Department affecting the subject, and for reasons following, this view of the matter was not unreasonable.

1. At the time these enlistments were made the impression prevailed generally in the Army and among the people that the war would end and the soldiers be discharged even before the expiration of the original term of service of the organizations into which such recruits were mustered.

2. The recruiting was carried on for particular regiments, and not for the service generally, there being no general system of recruiting for the Army established, thus naturally producing a belief that no service outside of or beyond the term of these regiments would be exacted.

3. The advantages of maintaining old organizations and placing recruits among old experienced associates under the command of tried officers, were apparent to all, and it was equally apparent that no recruits could be induced to enlist in any organization that would terminate prior to the expiration of the term for which said recruits were to be mustered, thereby separating such recruits from their former comrades and officers, and without their consent attaching them to organizations in which they would be total strangers.

4. Whole regiments had been enlisted and accepted into the service for terms no greater, thus inducing the belief that soldiers were desired without particular reference to the term of service.

5. The impending draft of that year was for a term of nine months, which induced the belief that volunteering for a much longer period, as was the case with such recruits, would be a judicious arrangement for the Government.

6. At the time these enlistments were made no system of recruiting had been devised or talked of, and of course there could be no intimation that any regiment would be continued beyond the time of its original enlistment.

With these views recruiting officers invariably informed such recruits that they were to be discharged at the expiration of the term of service of the old organizations into which they consented to be mustered, and this was agreed to and concurred in by the mustering officers then on duty.

Recruiting and mustering officers were strengthened in this view of the case from the general tenor of certain orders of the War Department, providing for and regulating recruiting for old regiments, which orders, when critically considered, were not as explicit as might have been desired, but nevertheless were apparently on the hypothesis that the recruiting was for the old regiments, and not for the general service, and that they would be discharged at the expiration of the term of such old regiments. One of the orders reads as follows:—

Now I ask the attention of the chairman to this order, when he says that the recruiting officers had no authority to receive a recruit for a term less than three years:

[General Orders, No. 108.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, — 28, 1863.

I. Whenever volunteer troops are mustered out of service, the entire regiment or other organization will be considered as mustered out at one time and place, except prisoners of war, who will be considered as in service until their arrival in a loyal State, with an allowance of time necessary for them to return to their respective places of enrollment.

By order of the Secretary of War:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

This is not very clear, as the Legislature say in their memorial; yet it did cause the opinion to be entertained that the entire regiments, including the new recruits, would be mustered out at one time.

Nor was this understanding, as your memorialists are advised, confined to the people of the State of Indiana, but it prevailed extensively in other States, and this general prevalence of such views tended to strengthen the same with the people of Indiana.

The following official document was extensively published in the public journals, and greatly tended to increase the probability of the correctness of the views generally entertained by the people—

I suppose this is the communication referred to by the Senator from Iowa—

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, September 26, 1862.

Sir: In reply to yours of the 21st instant, stating the number of regiments raised and to be raised in your State, and also making suggestions in reference to filling old regiments, I am directed to say that recruits for old regiments of volunteers for three years, or during the war, will be discharged at the expiration of the term for which the regiment was originally enlisted.

By order of the Secretary of War:

C. P. BUCKINGHAM,
Brigadier General and A. A. G.

His Excellency Governor Kirkwood, of Iowa.

Here is an express promise by the War Department as early as 1862 that the men who enlisted for the unexpired term of a regiment would be mustered out when the regiment was mustered out, and I cannot see that there is a question about it any longer. This is a communication to the Governor of the State of Iowa, informing him by the authority of the Secretary of War that these men would be discharged at the expiration of the term of the regiment.

Mr. COLLAMER. Will the gentleman have the goodness to read that communication again?
Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, September 26, 1862.

Sir: In reply to yours of the 21st instant, stating the number of regiments raised and to be raised in your State, and also making suggestions in reference to filling old regiments, I am directed to say that recruits for old regiments of volunteers for three years, or during the war, will be discharged at the expiration of the term for which the regiment was originally enlisted.

By order of the Secretary of War:

C. P. BUCKINGHAM,
Brigadier General and A. A. G.

His Excellency Governor Kirkwood, of Iowa.

I cannot say that I am particularly fascinated with the composition and clearness of the communication, and yet it caused the people to believe that these recruits would be discharged at the expiration of the term of the regiment:

"The foregoing facts your memorialists believe to be sufficient to establish the fact that recruits enlisted in old organizations, at the time referred to, were fully under the impression that they were only to serve for the unexpired term of the organization into which they were mustered, and that their retention in the service after such time works a great hardship upon them, and is greatly calculated to discourage and dishearten them. Your memorialists are fully aware that the muster-rolls which said recruits signed described an enlistment for three years or during the war, but at the same time are informed, and believe, that such averments in said rolls were explained to them as being more technical forms, and would in no wise interfere with the understanding upon which they were enlisted, and thus did not disturb the conviction in their minds that they would be discharged with the regiments they were assigned to; but, on the contrary, that the Government would, in good faith to her soldiers, execute fully the agreement made with them by the recruiting officers."

The memorial is of some length, and I will not read further. This memorial from the Legislature of the State of Indiana is certainly entitled to very much respect. It relates to a subject in which many soldiers from that State are deeply interested. I have received communications on the subject, and have applied to the War Department and succeeded in procuring the discharge of one company that was mustered in in terms according to the understanding of the men.

I do not think it is a sufficient answer to say that it would produce trouble in the Army. If the assurance was given by the War Department to these men at the time they enlisted that they would be discharged when the term of the regiment expired, it ought to be carried out. These men expected it, and I think it is but right it should be done.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator from Indiana will permit me a moment, I will call his attention to a very wide distinction between the case which he cites and the cases covered by the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia. The case which he cites was one which was authorized by the War Department itself, presumably by its head. The other case covers every one in which a recruiting officer may have made any promise to that effect; two very different things. I have no doubt that if the case which the Senator from Indiana represents is properly reported to the War Department, and is properly substantiated, it will be treated with every courtesy, and he will receive justice on that subject. It is competent now for the War Department to discharge soldiers when proper evidences are furnished. I do not think it is advisable that we shall here strip the Department of all discretion which can be governed by a sense of justice, and establish a general, sweeping law which will put it in the power of any individual acting outside of his official capacity by making promises to deplete the Army and deprive us of those we have so much trouble to enlist.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I offer an amendment to come in as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the third section of the act entitled "An act further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out of the national forces, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

I send to the desk to be read the section which I propose to repeal.

The section was read, as follows:

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Executive of any of the States to send recruiting agents into any of the States declared to be in rebellion, except the States of Arkansas, Tennessee, and Louisiana, to recruit volunteers under any call under the provisions of this act, who shall be credited to the State, and to the respective subdivisions thereof, which may procure the enlistment."

Mr. BUCKALEW and Mr. CARLILE called for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I should be very glad to hear the reasons why this proposition is made by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I do not know that this law has worked evil to the country in any way, and I am confident that it has given some thousands of men to the service.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As my friend from Pennsylvania does not respond, before the roll is called I wish to know from the Senator from Massachusetts whether a statement which I saw some time ago is correct. That statement was, that immediately upon the fall of Savannah, the Governor of Massachusetts had agents there to recruit so as to fill up the quota of Massachusetts, and that that was done before any permission was given by the authorities in Washington; and as the papers state, after the slaves were enlisted and were on shipboard and had started for Massachusetts, Governor Andrew made application to the President of the United States for permission to recruit in Savannah, and, as the papers state, the President graciously granted his request. Is that true? If it be true, it gives great advantages to certain States over others. In our State what is done when a draft is made? I am informed by my colleague, who has paid more attention to this subject than I have, that our State has already furnished more than her quota, and gets no allowance for it. When our people are drafted they have to go; we have no such facilities; we have no agents in the seceded States; we want none; but our young men have to leave their homes and go to the battle-field, young white men. When the terrible calamity of war is upon us, and when the young men of the country are called to go to the battle-field, we have a right to demand that the sons of Massachusetts and of other States shall go and share its perils. I should like the Senator from Massachusetts to answer the question whether the statement to which I have referred, as it appeared in the papers, be true. If it be true, it is an argument plain and powerful why the proposition of my friend from Pennsylvania should be adopted.

Mr. WILSON. I am not able to answer the question of the Senator from Delaware, but I can say that the Governor of Massachusetts believes in enlisting men in the rebel States; he believes in taking men from the cause of the rebellion and giving them to the cause of the country. He is an earnest, prompt man, and I have no doubt took the earliest possible action in this as in every other case affecting the interests of the country; and if he did not have an agent first at Savannah to enlist colored men, I think the reason must be that his agent took a slower vessel to reach there than the agent of any other State, for I am sure he would be as soon to send him, and as soon to ask authority, as the Governor of any other State.

Mr. SAULSBURY. In support of the remarks that I have made I will read an extract from a paper called the Commonwealth published in Boston, which is understood to be the organ of a distinguished member of this body, and which I suppose always states what is exactly correct in these matters. The extract reads in this wise:

"PROMPT AS USUAL.—Immediately on the fall of Savannah, Governor Andrew dispatched agents to that city to recruit black loyalists for the national Army, to be credited to the quota of the State. He then asked permission from the Secretary of War to do so, which was cheerfully accorded, and the documents will arrive out about the time the first squad is on its way to Massachusetts."

I appeal to the American Senate, is that right, is it fair? When the young men of my State, of Pennsylvania, and of other States, are compelled under your conscription law to leave their homes and go to the battle-field, is it right that the Governor of Massachusetts, or the Governor of any other State—I make no assault upon Massachusetts—shall be allowed to send agents into the southern States, waiting, perhaps, until some city falls, that they may recruit and enlist into their service the ignorant, degraded slave, and to count him as a man against the educated young man of my State? No, sir. If this direful war is to continue; if, as judging from the indications of the time I presume we are, we are to have twenty or fifty years of bloody fratricidal war in this country, I have a right to second the demand of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, and ask that you send your sons and your brothers to the field, when we are compelled to send there our sons and our brothers. Do not send your agents into the southern States to pick up the poor degraded African to fill your quota, and keep your sons and your brothers and the husbands of your daughters in your own midst to enjoy all the pleasures of life while ours are drawn away from home.

Why, Mr. President, if this thing is to be continued, there are certain States in this Union whose wealth is being daily increased by the continuance of this war, that can very well smile when our households are bathed in tears. The fathers of New England will not feel as the fathers of our sons feel when they are dragged from their homes. The mothers of your sons will not go down to their graves weeping, as Rachel of old, because they are not. Why? Because in the place of your sons you send the degraded African. Our households may be filled with mourning; the habitations of woe may be witnessed in every household with us; but you can rejoice and thank God that you are growing rich on the profits of a war supported by your votes, but the afflictions of which none of you personally feel.

Mr. GRIMES. It will be recollected by the Senate that this question was before it at the last session, and by several decisive votes it was decided that the law as it now stands ought not to be the law of the country. In other words, we refused upon several occasions to allow any State to go into any other State for the purpose of recruiting and filling up its quota. There was disagreement between this body and the House of Representatives, and the question was referred to a committee of conference, and in some way, after I left the city, this provision was adopted, contrary to the expressed opinion by a yea and nay vote several times made, of the Senate, and by very decisive votes. I trust now, sir, when we have the opportunity to do so, that we will put ourselves right on the record in this regard, and that we shall declare that if there are colored men in Savannah or in any other place to be recruited, they shall be recruited into the service of the United States and not into the service of any particular State; that we will clothe them, we will feed them, we will give them the bounties, we will furnish them with arms, we will become responsible, politically and morally, for their safe-keeping, and not allow this State or that State to assume to become the superintendent of these men, and claim them upon their quotas, and compel the other States that do not happen, perhaps, to have quite as prompt a Governor as the Senator from Massachusetts says they have, to fill up their quotas with the young white men of their States. These colored men in the rebel States are a fund that belong to all of us, and neither the State of Massachusetts, nor the State of Iowa, nor any other State, should be permitted to go and draw upon that fund so as to fill up its own quota, and thereby impose the necessity of a still greater draft upon the States which do not see fit to do this, or have not the opportunity to recruit these colored men. It is manifestly unjust, and I trust the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania will be adopted.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to say a word or two in answer to the Senator from Delaware, to which I desire his attention.

The United States have called upon Massachusetts for 117,624 men. Massachusetts had furnished, and was credited by the War Department up to the 22d of December last, in response to this call for 117,624 men, 125,437 three-years men, making a surplus of 7,813 more three-years men than the Government had called for. She has furnished on the call for 117,624 men, 153,486 of all kinds; but counting them as three-years men, she has furnished 125,437, being nearly 8,000 more than the quota asked for of three-years men. Massachusetts last year furnished 45,446 recruits to the Army.

Mr. SHERMAN. How many of those were credits for the naval service?

Mr. WILSON. I believe 16,625 during the war, of this number of men furnished in response to these calls, 10,672 out of 125,437 were foreign-born men. There has been a great deal said about importations of men to fill up the quota of Massachusetts. Nine hundred and seven men were imported from Germany and put into four Massachusetts regiments; of the number of black men put into service by Massachusetts, taking the whole number, those enlisted at home as well as those enlisted in all the rebel States, she has put in 4,731, and of this number about 1,200 were enlisted in the rebel States. Thus it will be seen, out of the 125,437 three-years men furnished by Massachusetts, but 15,000 of them were born outside of the United States or were colored persons.

The Governor of Massachusetts, in his last message, speaking in regard to these colored troops, says:

"If we have accepted colored volunteers who have come to Massachusetts for the purpose of becoming soldiers, and turned them over as soldiers of the United States, it is because when we began to accept them and until we had raised the equivalent of two regiments, no other opportunity for them existed in the country. We believed in colored men; others did not. We obtained permission to offer them. We assumed the hazards of the enterprise, but the country reaps the reward of its brilliant and assured success."

A great deal has been said in regard to the calls that have been made upon Massachusetts, and the troops that have been furnished by her. I venture to say here, without knowing what are the proportions furnished by the other States, that of the one hundred and fifty-three thousand men who have gone into the service from Massachusetts, quite as large a proportion were men who were born in New England, and lived in the State as can be found in any other State of the Union.

Here is the record in regard to the black troops furnished by Massachusetts. They number less than five thousand. During the last few weeks we have enlisted, perhaps, a few hundred more; for we believe in enlisting those men; we believe in using them; we are anxious to enlist them wherever we can find them; and we pay them a State bounty of $325, and we treat them in all respects like men.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator from Massachusetts supposed that in my remarks I meant any reflection upon the State of Massachusetts, or any other State, he is very much mistaken. I never have, since I have been a member of this body, made an assault on any State. I do not think it is my province to assail Massachusetts, or any other sovereign State of this Union; and I do not think it is in the province of any other Senator to assault my State, or any other State. I had no object of that kind in view. But I had this object: to call the attention of the country to the fact that while the young white men of my State were being drawn against their will, dragged into the Army of the United States, I had, in their behalf, a right to demand that the young educated white men of other States should go to the battle-field, and that a negro from a southern plantation should not be allowed to answer to the requirements of the draft so as to be put upon an equality with the young white men from my State. If the State of Massachusetts, or any other State in this Union, is so patriotic that it wishes to fill up the armies of the United States, and will send its agents South to gather up negro recruits and put them into the Army, and not ask that those negro recruits shall stand in the place of their own sons, I have no objection. De gustibus non est disputandum.

Mr. SUMNER. I merely wish to make one remark on this proposition. I am not aware that any abuses or evil consequences from the existing law have been shown.

Mr. GRIMES. Does the Senator recollect the letter of the distinguished General Sherman upon that subject?

Mr. SUMNER. What was the date of the letter? Does the Senator remember?

Mr. GRIMES. I cannot remember the precise date, but I remember distinctly it was after the passage of the law which is now sought to be repealed, and after some of the States had sent their recruiting agents down into General Sherman's army for the purpose of recruiting, thus coming in collision with the United States recruiting officers who were attempting to recruit the same men to go into United States regiments.

Mr. SUMNER. I am inclined to think the letter was written before the passage of this law.

Mr. NESMITH. The letter was written after the fall of Atlanta.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well. It was a good letter. I remember very well that it was a well-written letter, rather pointed, and seemed to be written rather with the point of the sword than with the pen, I thought, as I read it at the time. But, sir, I am not aware, notwithstanding the letter to which my friend from Iowa calls the attention of the Senate, that any abuse has been shown, nor any evil consequences, nor any evil example. I therefore submit to the Senate that inasmuch as the law exists, as it is already on our statute-book, it should not be hastily removed, unless some reason can be shown for the removal. The burden, therefore, is on the Senator from Pennsylvania, who makes this motion, to show that something wrong has occurred under this law.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I explain by saying that I desire each State to raise its own troops within its own limits, establishing a principle of equality, and that no State, by favoritism of the War Department, or of the President, or of generals in the field, shall be permitted to fill up its quota from the South.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator now brings forward another point. He speaks of favoritism, and says that no State by favoritism of the President or of the War Department should be allowed to recruit in the South. I will ask the Senator what favoritism there can be under this statute?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I refer to the paper already read in the presence of Senators.

Mr. SUMNER. I say what favoritism can there be under the law as it exists? Is it not open to all the States alike? There is no State that may not send its agents there, precisely as it is said Massachusetts has sent hers. Let us understand each other. Do not let us vote ignorantly. The Senator says that the law as it now exists operates unequally; that it opens the way to favoritism, either from the President or from the Secretary of War. Sir, he can show no such thing. The law as it exists operates equally throughout the whole country. If one State is more active in its recruiting agents, if it rushes swiftly to that field of exertion, there is no favoritism in it. That is from the activity and the energy of the State, and not from any favoritism or indulgence here in Washington. Therefore, sir, that argument of the Senator I put aside.

I come back, then, to the question with which I began when I was interrupted by the Senator from Iowa, what abuse, what evil example has been shown? Not one. Senators, if they vote for this proposition, must vote under the influence of prejudices and not of reason. There are Senators, I know, who have prejudices against the enlistment of colored troops; but I make an appeal to the patriotic Senators on this floor; those who love their country, and who hate belligerent slavery, not to yield to any such prejudice. I can understand that the Senator on the other side who smiles, the able Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] might follow his friend from Pennsylvania, because the Senator from Indiana always does vote against the employment of colored troops. He, therefore, if he sustains the proposition of his friend, will act naturally and in harmony with all he has done and said on this floor. I am sorry that he feels obliged to take that course. It is not for me, however, to criticise him. But how other Senators who do not follow the lead of the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Pennsylvania can strike at this enactment when no abuse under it has been shown, when, in point of fact, no reason has been adduced for its repeal, I am at a loss to understand.

I have said that nothing has been brought against the existing law. I may add now that something can be said in its favor. It has stimulated recruiting; it has secured to the public service certain soldiers who otherwise would not have borne arms for their country; and that alone, sir, is an all-sufficient reason for keeping it still longer on the statute-book.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am one of those who believe that a white soldier is more efficient than a negro soldier.

Mr. TRUMBULL. With the consent of the Senator from Kentucky I will ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a report from the joint committee appointed to canvass the vote for President and Vice President the day after tomorrow. It is indispensably necessary that we have action upon it as soon as possible. The House will have to concur in it. If the Senate will now consent to let the report be submitted and acted upon, it will take, I apprehend, but a few minutes—I think there will be no objection to it—and the House will then concur, so that we shall be ready to take action on the subject on Wednesday next.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to submit a report from the joint committee on the subject indicated. The Chair hears no objection.

COUNTING OF PRESIDENTIAL VOTE.

Mr. TRUMBULL. With the consent of the Senate I will read the report, as the handwriting is more legible to me than to the Clerk.

The joint committee to whom was referred the subject of ascertaining and providing a mode for canvassing and counting the votes for President and Vice President of the United States have instructed me to report the following joint rule in part in the discharge of their duty:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring therein,) That the following be added to the joint rules of the two Houses, namely:

The two Houses shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock, p. m., on the second Wednesday in February next succeeding the meeting of the electors of President and Vice President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be their Presiding Officer. One teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes; and said tellers having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses then assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been counted, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with the list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

That is the usual form, as far as I have read, of the resolutions heretofore adopted. The committee have proceeded further to provide for a contingency:

If, upon the reading of any such certificate by the tellers, any question shall arise in regard to counting the votes therein certified, the same having been stated by the Presiding Officer, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and said question shall be submitted to that body for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall in like manner state the question to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no question shall be decided affirmatively, and no vote objected to shall be counted, except by the concurring vote of the two Houses, which being obtained, the two Houses shall immediately reassemble, and the Presiding Officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted; and upon any such question there shall be no debate in either House. And any other question pertinent to the object for which the two Houses are assembled may be submitted and determined in like manner.

At such joint meeting of the two Houses seats shall be provided as follows: for the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, the chair on his left; for Senators, the body of the Hall on the right of the Presiding Officer; for Representatives, the body of the Hall not occupied by Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon either side of the Speaker's platform.

Such joint convention shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared, and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to the counting of any such vote, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess not beyond the next day at the hour of one o'clock, p. m.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood the Senator from Illinois to say that the latter part of the report is not to be found in the reports heretofore made by which these conventions have heretofore been governed, and if I recollect the reading aright it provides only for a single contingency; that is to say, the contingency of votes being objected to. It appears to me it would be desirable to provide that in the event of any other question being made—

Mr. TRUMBULL. It does so provide. It provides specifically for any other question pertinent to the matter for which the two Houses are assembled.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not understand it so.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It so reads.

Mr. COWAN. There is one difficulty I would suggest to the honorable Senator from Illinois. It is provided that when questions shall arise in the joint convention, the Houses shall separate and consider the matter separately. Now, suppose there is a question there whether the vote of Louisiana shall be counted. The Senate retires to its Chamber and decides that it shall; the House of Representatives organizes and decides that it shall not; how is the question then to be decided?

Mr. JOHNSON. It falls, of course, and would not be counted.

Mr. COWAN. I think there is a fundamental mistake at the bottom of this provision. I think it belongs to the Houses in joint convention to decide that question when it arises. It is evident that they are there with some power and authority over it. They cannot be supposed to be mere idle and indifferent spectators, because otherwise the votes might be counted separately in the separate Chambers. Therefore I think that that provision is objectionable. Any one of the Houses, then, could disfranchise a State according to the construction that is to be put upon it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The question then has to be decided by the concurrent action of the two Houses, and I suppose committees of conference, may be resorted to to bring that about. It has to be decided somehow, and this provides a mode when the question arises by which it shall be settled. If the Senator from Pennsylvania chooses to suppose that you must take a vote per capita, the Constitution provides no means for any such action. The only way the two Houses of Congress can act is independently of each other. It was the unanimous opinion of the committee that it could not be done by voting en masse, as in a public meeting. That question was very elaborately discussed the other day. I hope no discussion is to spring up on this report, because it is important that we have action upon it at once.

Mr. COWAN. I ask the honorable Senator whether there is any other case in which the two Houses go into joint convention except this one.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They do not go into joint convention here. They meet together simply to provide for the counting of the vote; but there is no provision for their taking action as a joint body. They go there to see the votes opened, and then Congress provides by law how they shall proceed. This is my view of it.

Mr. COWAN. That assumes the very point in dispute. The allegation of some of us is that they do go into joint convention; that the phrase which gives them power and authority to do so is a general phrase. The mode and manner in which it is to be exercised of course must be fixed by law, or must be fixed by rules to be adopted for the governance of this convention itself; and to show that it is a convention, and to show it conclusively, the resolution offered by the committee to-day provides for its organization, provides that it shall have a Presiding Officer, provides some rules at least for its governance, provides for the appointment of tellers.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Each House appoints the tellers, not the joint convention.

Mr. COWAN. Then I think the joint convention should appoint the tellers.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It never was done since the Government was formed. That part of the resolution is similar to the one we have always acted under since Washington was elected President.

Mr. COWAN. Then we encounter the mischief I suggested a moment ago. If there was a partisan majority in the Senate opposed to the counting of the votes of a particular State, all it had to do would be to stand firmly upon its resolve that they should not be counted, and that State would be disfranchised by the act of the Senate alone. The House would have the same privilege precisely. Was that ever contemplated?

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow me to put a question to him he will see that there is nothing in the question he asks.

Mr. COWAN. Certainly; I shall be very glad to see it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Suppose either House obstinately refuses to go there at all. If you are to suppose that the Senate of the United States is determined to break up the Government, they will not meet at all. You might just as well suppose that as to suppose that it will obstinately refuse to perform any other duty.

Mr. COWAN. I have heard that argument repeatedly before, and it comes very badly from the mouth of one who provides for a proposition of the kind. I admit you have no right to presume it; but you have no right to provide that they may do it. You have no right to put the Senate in such a position as that it may do it. You have a right to foresee the mischief before it happens; but by the adoption of these rules it is a tacit admission that the Senate may do that thing. There is no presumption that the Senate will not go into joint convention, although I am very sorry to say that such a mode of procedure is too common now among the States, among men who think by that means they can gain an advantage from the country when they are overthrowing the very fundamental laws which underlie its institutions. I think this matter should be left with the joint convention; that in that convention all questions which arise as to the validity of votes there to be counted by that convention should be determined.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee.

The report was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1865.

NEW SERIES....No. 39.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 408) in addition to the several acts for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendments of Mr. BUCKALEW, to amend the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, by adding the following as an additional section:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the third section of the act entitled "An act further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out of the national forces, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I had remarked that I was one of those who believed that the white soldier was more efficient in battle and in all the service of a soldier, except probably manual labor, than the negro. The objection now made is not to the enlistment of negro soldiers, but to the substitution of negro soldiers for white soldiers. I believe that the intelligent free white men of Massachusetts, of any northern State, and of any State in the Union, are a superior order of soldiery to the negroes of Alabama and of Georgia. The sense in which I desire this repeal to take place is this: that the effect of the provision proposed to be repealed is to exclude the intelligent, superior soldiery of the northern States, and of all the States, from the Army to some extent, and to make an inefficient negro soldiery their substitutes. I object to that. If the Government or the Senate desire negro soldiers to be recruited and to be brought into the Army, be it so; but let them be brought in on account of the United States, and not of any particular State. Let them come in as soldiers of the Republic at large, and not of Massachusetts or any particular State.

Now, sir, if this measure is not repealed, what is the condition of the States relatively? There are some States too poor in their revenues and in their resources to offer large and attractive bounties. Here is the State of Massachusetts, that has so much aggregated wealth that the bounties in that State in various forms in the aggregate, as I understood at the last session, amounted to from ten to fifteen hundred dollars per man. Here then is the State of Indiana, or the State of Kentucky, that has not the means to offer such large and alluring bounties for white or negro soldiers. Massachusetts has these means. She goes down into the South, and with her large bounties is enabled to recruit negro soldiers to an extent sufficient to exonerate her whole white population from military service, or, at any rate, to exonerate to a considerable extent her white population from military service. The effect is that money can buy an inferior soldiery, and the law now proposed to be repealed allows that inferior soldiery to be substituted for the superior soldiery; in other words, the negro substitute exempts the white man upon whom the draft would otherwise devolve. Suppose the quota of Massachusetts is twenty thousand under the new draft, and she is enabled to substitute ten thousand southern negroes for that number of her white population. Would the United States make anything by the exchange? Would it or not be a bad bargain? Would it or not be the substitution of an inferior for a superior soldiery?

The argument that that measure brings the negro soldier into the field is not a good argument; it is not true in point of fact. The negro can be brought into the field without the benefit of the section which is now proposed to be repealed. In the county of Bourbon, in which I reside, over eight hundred negro soldiers have been recruited into the service, and they have not been recruited into the service by the operation of the law which the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania now proposes to repeal. I venture the opinion that if there were one hundred thousand intelligent white men, such as can be drafted or procured by volunteering in the northern States, in one army, and one hundred and fifty thousand southern negroes in an opposing army, and they were led by officers of equal skill and ability in war, the one hundred thousand white soldiers would be an overmatch for the one hundred and fifty thousand negro soldiers. Therefore, sir, I am in favor of the repeal of this provision which was intended to operate for the benefit of Massachusetts and the other northern States that have ample funds out of which to give large bounties. It operates in their favor by allowing them to enlist, to buy—yes, sir, to enter into the slave traffic, to enter into the purchase of negroes, and to buy negro soldiers for their surplus money, and to substitute those negro inferior soldiers and exonerate their white men from service in the field.

Upon that ground I am in favor of this repeal. My objection is not that under it negroes are put into the army. I have made the objection to negro soldiers heretofore often, but it has been overruled a hundred times, and I acquiesce in the decision of the Senate and of the nation that negroes are to go into the army. That is not my objection to this measure; but my objection is that every negro thus brought into the army excludes a white man, who would make a superior soldier, from it. They are a more expensive soldiery than the white soldier. All the army reports prove that. They are more destructive upon arms, upon clothing; more wasteful in all the munitions and supplies of war than a white soldiery are; and an aggregate of one hundred thousand negro soldiers would be much more expensive to maintain than one hundred thousand white soldiers. I want the superior soldier, the more economical and less expensive soldier to be brought into the field, and that he shall not be excluded by the inferior negro soldier being bought by the money of Massachusetts or of any other State.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I certainly would not have introduced this controverted point of the last session now, but since it is before us I feel bound to vote according to my convictions on the subject. It will be well remembered by the Senate that on several decisive votes a decided majority of the Senate were opposed to sending State agents into the southern States to enlist negro soldiers. It was the almost unanimous desire of the Senate to enlist all the negro troops possible, but it was the opinion of a large majority that those soldiers when enlisted should not be credited to a particular State, but ought to be entered into the service as United States volunteers. The objection to sending agents to the southern States was that it created an unhealthy competition and strife and contention which would probably interfere with the public service or the proper employment of negroes in the southern States. That was my conviction then; it is my conviction now. I have conversed with many officers on the subject since, and they have uniformly informed me that wherever these agents came they created embarrassment, struggle, strife, and contention. In one case a general officer told me that a few negroes who had been employed in the quartermaster's service, where their services were as valuable as they could be in any capacity, were actually taken away from Memphis, Tennessee, by the offer of large bounties, transported in Government vessels, taken to a remote State, there enlisted into the service of the United States, credited to that State, and carried back to the same place where their services were less valuable in their new capacity than they were before all this money had been expended upon them.

At the same time we have no right to complain of Massachusetts or any other State in this regard. This is not a question affecting a particular State. If the Governor of Massachusetts is more active in availing himself of the privilege conferred by the law than others, we have no right to complain of it. If Governor Andrew is always first at the feast, we have no right to complain, because the law of the last session, which was passed against the decisive vote of the Senate, and passed by the agency of a committee of conference, gave to the Governor of Massachusetts and the State of Massachusetts the legal right to enlist these negroes, and if they are more active than other States, we have no right to complain. The fault is in the system.

Reference has been made to a letter by General Sherman, which was published. I know from him, as well as from his public communications, that these attempts to enlist negro soldiers in the army of the Mississippi created embarrassments, until finally he had to compel them to leave his lines. There was a competition between the agents of the different States offering these increased bounties, sometimes more, sometimes less, creating a strife right in his own army, so that it was necessary for him in order to preserve military discipline in his camp to exclude these State agents altogether. It was not done out of any disrespect of Congress, but simply to preserve military order.

The reason given by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts for this law at the last session does not now apply. He said then that it was desirable to get these negroes in the service of the United States, (and that I conceded;) and he said that the military authorities of the United States would not enlist them; that some of our military officers were opposed to the enlistment of negroes, and would not promote their enlistment; and it was said that in the army of the Mississippi no efforts were made to enlist negro soldiers. That is not now the case. Every general officer, from the highest to the lowest, so far as I know, is in favor of enlisting negroes in our Army. There never was any objection to it in my mind; and from the beginning of this war I believed it was the policy of the Government to employ negro laborers and negro soldiers. There is not now an officer in the service but what is willing and anxious to promote the employment of negro soldiers. I have here an order issued recently, dated "Headquarters Military Division of the Mississippi, in the field, Savannah, Georgia, January 16, 1865," in which it is made the express duty of all the military officers in that army to encourage the enlistment of negro soldiers, from which I will read an extract. In speaking of the condition of the negroes, it is declared:

"By the laws of war and orders of the President of the United States the negro is free, and must be dealt with as such. He cannot be subjected to conscription or forced military service, save by the written orders of the highest military authority of the Department, under such regulations as the President or Congress may prescribe. Domestic servants, blacksmiths, carpenters, and other mechanics, will be free to select their own work and residence; but the young and able-bodied negroes must be encouraged to enlist as soldiers in the service of the United States, to contribute their share toward maintaining their own freedom and securing their rights as citizens of the United States. Negroes so enlisted will be organized into companies, battalions, and regiments, under the orders of the United States military authorities, and will be paid, fed, and clothed, according to law. The bounties paid on enlistment may, with the consent of the recruit, go to assist his family and settlement in procuring agricultural implements, seed, tools, boots, clothing, and other articles necessary for their livelihood."

Now, Mr. President, when it is not only the law, but when it is the practice of all our general officers in the field, to enlist these soldiers in the service of the United States, why should we send the agents of the States down there to compete with our own enlisting servants? It seems to me the most ridiculous proceeding that can possibly be had. When these negroes enter our service in Georgia, they do not cost the Government anything; we pay them no bounties; they are willing to enter the service to fight for their liberty. But when you allow the agent of the State of Ohio, or any other agent, to go and enlist those negroes, the United States pay to each one of them a bounty; they are transported in Government vessels, perhaps not according to law, but they are necessarily transported from the scene of operations back to the State where they are enrolled and enlisted, and credited to the State, and finally sent back. All this enormous expense is had without any occasion and without any necessity, and probably they are sent back to perform the same duty after a three or four months' voyage northward and back again. It seems to me a very ridiculous and absurd farce.

I would not have moved to repeal this law, simply because the law fell dead; it was not practically executed in any of our military lines, because all the military officers in the whole line of our operations across the continent interfered by military orders with the operations of these State agents. They had necessarily to do so, not from any opposition to the employment of negroes, but simply to prevent the strife and contention that was inevitable from such a state of affairs. As the proposition has been made, I hope the Senate will adopt it, and repeal that provision of law, which, I think, was unwisely and unadvisedly passed at the last session.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. President, it may be altogether unnecessary, but after the remarks made by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] if I understood him aright, I deem it necessary to say a few words in relation to this matter.

I understood that Senator either directly to declare, or it was an inference derived from the current of his remarks, that all who were in favor of the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania were rather disinclined or opposed to the employment of negro troops in the armies of the United States. My opinions upon that subject having been misunderstood in quarters which I deem much more interesting to me than even the Senate, I wish simply to say that I am not opposed to the employment of negro troops in the Army. So far from it, as long back as the 22d of July, 1861, (and I remember the date because it was the day following the first battle of Bull Run,) I declared myself upon this floor in favor of the employment of such troops in the Army, and cited the example of General Jackson at New Orleans in support of it. But, sir, I can see a very great difference between the employment of such troops generally and this provision which it is now proposed to repeal, the design of which was to bring them into the service solely or mainly through the agency of the different States, and thus create a controversy and contest between the States in procuring this class of persons for the public service. Entertaining that view, during the discussion of the enrollment bill at the last session of Congress I opposed that section, which subsequently became a law through the agency of a committee of conference who met upon that subject. I was then, and am now, in favor of employing, not only colored troops, but all other troops that can be procured in the rebel States, to strengthen the arm of the Federal Government and weaken the arm of the rebellion.

But my opinion is that the best way to do that is in the way pointed out by the commanders of our armies. The best way is to recruit them into the Union service generally without assigning them to any particular State, or giving any particular State the benefit of them. I shall not weary the Senate by undertaking to recapitulate the several reasons that have been assigned for this course, showing that it is more beneficial, more desirable, and freer from objections. They are apparent and manifest to every one.
